THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32ND CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1851.

NEW SERIES....No 1.

This is the first number of the Congressional Globe for this session—the first of the Thirty-second Congress. I will print several thousand surplus copies for the purpose of supplying all persons who may subscribe within a reasonable time—say by the 13th January—with complete copies of the work.

The first number of the Appendix will be printed in two or three days. The Appendix will contain the Messages of the President of the United States; the Reports of the heads of the Departments; all the long speeches of the members of both Houses of Congress, written out or revised by themselves; and all Laws and Joint Resolutions which shall be passed during this session.

The Congressional Globe for the last long session—the first of the 31st—made 2,180, and the Appendix 1,716 pages; making together 3,896 pages. The Congressional Globe for this session it is believed will not contain as many pages as it did then. The Appendix for this session will probably make more than it did the last long session, as all the laws passed this session will be printed in it, which has not been done heretofore.

The following are the prices for them during the session:

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 1, 1851.

This being the day set apart by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress, the Senators assembled in their Chamber, at 12 m.

The following Senators were present:

Maine.—Mr. Hamlin.
New Hampshire.—Messrs. Hale and Norris.
Vermont.—Messrs. Upham and Foot.
Massachusetts.—Messrs. Davis and Sumner.
Rhode Island.—Messrs. Clarke and James.
Connecticut.—Mr. Smith.
New York.—Messrs. Fish and Seward.
New Jersey.—Mr. Miller.
Pennsylvania.—Messrs. Brodhead and Cooper.
Delaware.—Messrs. Spruance and Bayard.
Maryland.—Messrs. Pearce and Pratt.
Virginia.—Mr. Mason.
Georgia.—Messrs. Berrien and Dawson.
Alabama.—Messrs. King and Clemens.
Mississippi.—Mr. Foote.
Ohio.—Messrs. Chase and Wade.
Kentucky.—Messrs. Underwood and Clay.
Indiana.—Messrs. Bright and Whitcomb.
Illinois.—Mr. Shields.
Missouri.—Messrs. Atchison and Geyer.
Michigan.—Messrs. Cass and Felch.
Florida.—Mr. Morton; Stephen R. Mallory and D. L. Yulee, contestants.
Iowa.—Messrs. Dodge and Jones.
Wisconsin.—Messrs. Dodge and Walker.
California.—Mr. Gwin.

THE PRESIDENT of the Senate, Hon. Wm. R. KING, having called the Senate to order, the Rev. C. M. BUTLER, Chaplain to the Senate, performed devotional exercises.

Mr. SEWARD then rose and said: Mr. President, I beg leave to present the credentials of the Hon. HAMILTON FISH, a Senator elect from the State of New York for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March last.

The credentials were read at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. CHASE. I beg leave to present the credentials of the Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE, a Senator elect from the State of Ohio.

The credentials were read.

Mr. MILLER. I beg leave to present the credentials of the Hon. ROBERT F. STOCKTON, a Senator elect from the State of New Jersey.

The credentials were read.

Mr. CLARKE. I beg leave to present the credentials of the Hon. CHARLES T. JAMES, a Senator elect from the State of Rhode Island.

The credentials were read.

Mr. ATCHISON. I desire to present the credentials of HENRY S. GEYER, a Senator elect from the State of Missouri.

The credentials were read.

Mr. CASS. I have been requested to present the credentials of CHARLES SUMNER, a Senator elect from the State of Massachusetts.

The credentials were read.

The Hon. Hamilton Fish, Benjamin F. Wade, Charles T. James, Henry S. Geyer, and Charles Sumner, then proceeded to the President's seat, and the usual oath was administered to them.

CONTESTED SEAT OF SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President: I beg leave to present to the Senate the certificate of the Governor of the State of Florida, certifying the election of the Hon. STEPHEN R. MALLORY to the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March last.

I beg leave, also, to present to the Senate a copy of the journal of the House of Representatives of the State of Florida, showing the proceedings of the joint meeting of the two Houses of the Legislature on the occasion of the election of a Senator for the term mentioned, and which is claimed by the Hon. DAVID L. YULEE, as evidence that he was elected as the Senator of the State of Florida for the term commencing on the 4th of March last. The proceedings are certified by the Secretary of State of Florida.

I have considered it my especial duty to present to the Senate the claims of each of the gentlemen to the seat in this body of a Senator from Florida, for such action as the Senate may think proper, without indicating on my part what that action should be, but simply ask that the papers may be read.

The credentials signed by the Governor of Florida, and the proceedings of the Legislature in the election of a Senator, extracted from its journals, certified by the Secretary of State, were also read.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression, that inasmuch as it is apparent that there is a contest for the seat of Senator from Florida, it is not his province to decide who is entitled to it. Under ordinary circumstances, he would ask the gentleman whose credentials are presented to come forward and take the oath; but heretofore some cases have arisen—there was one of great importance in the case of a Senator from Rhode Island—in which it was left to the Senate to decide whether the individual having the certificate should be qualified and the contest afterwards go on. It is, therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, a proper subject for the Senate to decide, as to whether they will admit either gentleman previous to an investigation by a committee, or exclude both until after an investigation. The Chair expresses no opinion on the subject, although, as a member of the Senate, he once gave an opinion in the course of the Rhode Island case. Another case, although it was not precisely like this, is that of Mr. Lanman of Connecticut, who was not permitted to take his seat because the Governor of Connecticut appointed him when he had no right to appoint, the Legislature having been in session after the vacancy and before the appointment. The cases are not similar.

The Chair trusts that the Senate will take some action in the matter, in order that the question may be decided, so that he may ascertain whether it is his duty to administer the oath to the gentleman who received the certificate or not.

Mr. BRIGHT. In order to reach the facts in this case in as condensed a form as possible, I move that the credentials of the Senator elect, together with the extract from the journals of the Florida Legislature, be referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, for one, I cannot vote for that motion. I think the case is perfectly clear, according to the usage existing in every deliberative body of which I have any knowledge. Mr. Mallory comes here with a credential in due form, affording prima facie evidence of his right to the seat which he claims. There is presented at the same time, and I must say informally, in my judgment, proceedings behind the credentials which took place in the legislative body. I say they are informally presented, because it appears to me that they could only be legitimately offered at the time when the gentleman contesting the seat of Mr. Mallory should choose to present a petition claiming that seat. Under these circumstances, but for the motion already made, I should move at once that the oath of office be administered to Mr. Mallory.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi: I hope that, under the circumstances, the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. BAIGHT] will not press his motion. I understand that a very recent precedent has been supplied by this body in support of the views just announced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY.] I certainly should have made the motion suggested by him, but that I waited, I thought with due deference, for some older member of the Senate to make some motion. It seems to me that my friend from Indiana will not hesitate, after this explanation, to withdraw his motion, that the other motion may take its place. I think the Senator whose credentials have been presented, should be permitted to take his seat until some contest arises which may oust him therefrom.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, the public papers have advised us of the existence of this controversy, and I presume it has engaged the attention and occupied the reflection of the members of the Senate. In my view of the subject, it is a case altogether without precedent. I think neither of the cases which have been mentioned afford a precedent which can properly guide and direct us on this occasion. In the case of Mr. Lanman, there was no party contesting; but upon the face of the case there was a manifest assumption of authority not conferred by the Constitution upon the Executive of a State. The Senate, therefore, of itself, took that subject into consideration, and decided that Mr. Lanman was not entitled to a seat. That case, I apprehend, was entirely different from the present.

A word now as to the Rhode Island case—the case of Robbins and Potter. The credentials of Mr. Robbins, holding a certificate from the Governor of the State, had been presented at a session anterior to that at which he proposed to take his seat. When the time for the meeting of Congress arrived, Mr. Potter came, presenting a similar certificate of his subsequent election by the Legislature, founded upon the assumption, by this second Legislature, of the invalidity of the act of the first. It was in that state of facts that the question was presented to the Senate. Relying upon the fact that Mr. Robbins's credentials had been received and read in the Senate and placed upon their files, and upon the consideration that after the 4th of March subsequent to such reception of the credentials, Mr. Robbins, holding this prima facie evidence of his election, would have been entitled to his seat, the Senate determined that he should be permitted to take the oath as a member of the Senate, and the subject was then referred to a committee to ascertain the validity of the claims of the respective parties. But here, sir, is a case in which two parties present themselves, claiming a seat in the Senate of the United States. The question of the right of either of these gentlemen to that seat is a question, the obligation to decide which is imposed by the Constitution upon us. It is impossible to transfer this authority to any other functionary. The Governor of the State of Florida has granted a certificate in the form of a commission, testifying to the election of one of these individuals. The proceedings of the Legislature upon which that certificate of the Governor is founded, and coincidence with which is absolutely indispensable to give to that certificate any validity whatever, are before us. Without doubt it is the usage of the Senate to allow to the certificate of the Governor this prima facie effect. But what is prima facie evidence? Of what validity is prima facie evidence in the face of evidence which is plenary? I beg not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the effect of the facts which are disclosed in those proceedings. I am answering the suggestion, that the certificate of the Governor is prima facie evidence which imposes upon the Senate the obligation to admit the person in whose favor the certificate has been granted, to a seat. I say this has been the usage uniformly where an individual presents the certificate of the Governor of a State, and no party appears to contest his claim; it is received as prima facie evidence, and the prima facie evidence becomes absolute in the absence of any contradictory evidence. Here, however, you have the evidence upon which the certificate was founded, and you have here another individual claiming that upon that plenary evidence which he submits he is the Senator elect from Florida. Can you recede from your obligations under the Constitution to decide between these conflicting claims? Can you transfer to the Governor of the State of Florida the right, and throw upon him the responsibility of deciding facts which are before you, and which the Constitution makes it your duty to decide? Prima facie evidence may be allowed, in its effect, to become conclusive in the absence of plenary evidence; but here is that plenary evidence, here are those facts authenticated before you, upon which the contestant claims his seat in this body, and upon which he denies the validity of the certificate by the Governor. Then it is no longer to be considered as prima facie evidence which entitles the party holding it to anything resulting from its force and effect, till it is compared with the plenary evidence, and you have decided upon that. At the first election which took place, there appears to have been cast twenty-nine votes for one gentleman and twenty-nine blanks. The question which that record presents is, whether these blanks are votes—whether the party receiving these twenty-nine votes was the sole nominee on that occasion.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I rise to a point of order. With great respect and kindness for the honorable gentleman, it does seem to me that he is discussing the merits of the case, whereas the question at present is, I believe, only upon what has been the usage of the Senate in such cases. I make this suggestion with great deference; but the remarks of the honorable Senator from Georgia may give rise to controversy.

The PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on referring to a select committee of five.

Mr. BERRIEN. Unquestionably; and that is met by the suggestion that the prima facie evidence afforded by the certificate ought to control the action of the Senate so far as to entitle one of these gentlemen to be sworn in. I am endeavoring to show my own view of the propriety of that suggestion—my own view of the proposition that this is to be considered prima facie evidence leading to such a result under the existing circumstances of the case—and I submit to you, sir, that I am perfectly in order, and arguing the question with the same strictness with which I should be required to discuss it before a judicial tribunal.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I will withdraw the point if the Senator desires to proceed.

Mr. BERRIEN. If, in the view of the Chair, I have departed from the rules of order, I will cheerfully acquiesce.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. BERRIEN. Sir, the single question presented to our consideration is the validity of the first election. I say, the single question which must ultimately be presented to the consideration of the Senate is the validity of that first election; because if that first election be valid, all the subsequent acts, whether legislative or executive, must be invalid. And therefore to allow to the certificate of a Governor, founded on those facts which are in evidence, such an effect as would destroy the validity of that first election to a certain extent before the Senate has inquired into it, would in my judgment be a manifest error.

Sir, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this question, and I should not perhaps have gone so far in the observations which I have made but for the suggestion of a departure on my part from the rules of order. I depart not from the order of the discussion. I maintain, according to my view of the subject, that the prima facie evidence afforded by the certificate granted by the Governor is so far controlled by the exemplification of the legislative record, that it would be improper for the Senate to act on this subject so as to advance the interest either of one or the other of these parties, until an investigation shall have been had by a select committee upon the plenary evidence now before us which, in deciding the question the Senate must ultimately decide, the validity of the first election, will, if that validity be affirmed, relieve the Senate from the consideration of all other questions.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I stated before my own recollection of a very recent precedent in this body. I find my recollection to be that of every member of the body with whom I have had a consultation. It was the case of a Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] His right to his seat was gravely disputed. We decided to admit him to his seat in the first instance. We also positively decided, gravely and deliberately, that his having accepted the seat with the consent of the Senate placed him in such a position as not to allow him, during our deliberations, to resign. The book containing this precedent has just been furnished me. I have not had an opportunity of looking into it; but I believe the Senate on that occasion did decide that the certificate of the election supplied prima facie evidence of his right to the seat, and that it was the duty of the Senate, on the simple presentation of it, to allow the Senator to be sworn in and take his seat until a contest should arise, the result of which was an ousting of that Senator. I understand that to have been settled. If so—if such was the decision of this body in that case, it seems to me not exactly in strict order, for me at least, to go beyond the only legitimate evidence pertaining to a case of that kind, to wit, the evidence contained in the certificate of the Executive. I shall therefore limit my remarks to that precise point.

The reason why I rose before, and called the honorable Senator from Georgia to order—I hope in a very respectful manner—was, that it seemed to me that his line of remark would necessarily open a field for discussion to a very considerable extent, and give rise to a great deal of feeling, and might more or less embarrass our action in this matter. My impression is yet, that the most expedient course to be pursued would be for the honorable Senator from Indiana to withdraw his motion, and allow the one intimated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to be submitted in its place. We could then settle the question very easily; and while the whole subject was referred to a committee, the State of Florida would be fully represented in this body. If my friend will not do that, his refusal may oblige some of us to move a modification, to strike out all after the word “Resolved” of his resolution, and in lieu of it a proposition to admit the honorable Senator from Florida to his seat at once. I shall accordingly make that motion, unless my friend will, in the spirit of compromise—for which I know he is distinguished—allow the course of proceeding which I have intimated, to be adopted. If he will withdraw his motion I think we could get at the point, and have it settled at once, so far as the prima facie proceeding is concerned.

Mr. MASON. My attention has been called to this question to some extent. I think that at the last session the gentleman who was then the Senator from Florida, [Mr. YULEE,] and whose term expired on the 4th of March last, presented to the Senate an extract from the journals of the Legislature of Florida, with a view, as he stated at the time, according to my recollection, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact of an election which had been made by that Legislature, and which he suggested had resulted in his favor. The only action of the Senate upon it at present, I presume, will be such as to enable this body, holding the scales perfectly even between these gentlemen, to make the inquiry which necessarily devolves upon us in such a manner as to discharge the duty faithfully which the Senate owes to the country and to the State of Florida. It does seem to me, from the consideration that I have been able to bestow upon this subject, that where a gentleman presents himself to the Senate with a return, in its technical and legal sense, showing that he has been elected to this body, it is necessarily to be received as prima facie evidence of his election, and, according to the usage of the Senate, and I believe of all deliberative bodies, he takes his seat, and awaits any controversy that may subsequently arise respecting his right to that seat. But if the gentleman presents himself without a return in its technical and legal sense, and any serious doubt is entertained and is presented as to the validity of his election, he then appears, I apprehend, without having this prima facie evidence in his favor.

Now, if I understand the meaning of the term “prima facie evidence,” it means necessarily that it is competent evidence; it must be evidence just as competent as that which will prove the fact legitimately, and the only effect of such evidence is to shift the burden of proof upon the party who contests the fact thus proven. The Constitution of the United States, according to my examination, has three provisions upon this subject. The first lodges the right to elect the Senator in the Legislatures of the States, and does nothing more. As these provisions are very short, although the Senate are very familiar with them, I will ask leave to refer to them. By section 3, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that “the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.” The right of choosing is therefore lodged in the Legislature of the State. The next provision is in section 4, article 1, and provides that “the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.” And the third provision is in section 5, same article, which provides that “each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members,” &c.

Now, the Constitution does not prescribe how the fact of the election shall be certified to the Senate, but leaves that power with the Legislatures of the States. I have not looked—for I have not had time—further than to the legislation of Virginia—my own State—upon that subject. I find that the State of Virginia has prescribed the form of the return. The first Senators that were elected under the Constitution were elected in 1778. It is provided by law that the Clerk of the House of Delegates shall notify the Governor of the election of Senators, and the Governor shall cause the credentials to be made out under the seal of the Commonwealth, and sent to the Senator elect, to be presented to the Senate of the United States. It prescribes the form of the credentials, which is, in effect, a certificate from the government that the Senator, A B, has been chosen, in pursuance of the Constitution, by the General Assembly of the State of Virginia. That is, prima facie, competent and sufficient evidence of the fact of the election in the manner and form prescribed by law. And under such returns I apprehend that the party thus certified to be elected will have the right to take his seat in this body, and then await the result of any controversy that may arise.

But in the present case there is no such return. In the State of Florida there is no law, as I am informed, prescribing the mode in which the fact of the election shall be certified. The Governor has certified that fact in the case now before us, but without the authority of law for so doing. Another gentleman has presented an exemplified copy of what he claims to have been an election of Senator by the Legislature of Florida. I am informed—that gentleman [Mr. YULEE] has placed in my hands, at my request, the legislation of Florida upon that subject—that it makes the Secretary of the Commonwealth the keeper of the journals of the Legislature, and gives to that Secretary the power to exemplify, under the great seal of the Commonwealth, all papers of that character. It seems to me, then, that if there be a return at all, in its technical and legal sense, it is the exemplification of the proceedings of the Legislature, which has been certified under the great seal of the Commonwealth, and which is presented by the gentleman [Mr. YULEE] who claims to have been elected by the first action of the Legislature upon that subject. That is an exemplification in pursuance of the law of Florida by the keeper of the journals of the proceedings of its Legislature.

I submit these remarks with very great deference, in the belief that there is before us no correct return of the election of Senator, and, therefore, the burden of proof has not been shifted, but the parties stand in aquale jure, and that the proper course for us to pursue is the course indicated by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] to refer this matter to a committee.

Mr. HALE. As has been well said, it is proper that the Senate should keep itself in such a situation that no undue advantage should be given to one or other of the gentlemen claiming the seat. It strikes me to be a matter of very great moment that this question should be settled aright. And it also strikes me that it is a peculiarly fortunate time, and that the circumstances attending the question are peculiarly fortunate also to enable the Senate to settle it irrespective of any extraneous considerations. It is a very different case from that which occurred in the other wing of the Capitol a few years ago, when the members from

New Jersey presented themselves with the prima facie evidence, and the result of the political majority of the House was to be changed as that went one way or another. That was a very unfortunate circumstance, under which the rights of individuals were to be settled. Fortunately, in this case there is nothing of that sort. I presume both these gentlemen are sound on the great questions that have disturbed the country, and that have been so happily settled. There can, therefore, be no difficulty on that score; and the political majority here is so decisive and so decided that it cannot be disturbed even by the presence of what Free-Soilers have got smuggled into the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I rise to a point of order. I do not think the gentleman is discussing anything now before us. The question of free-soil is in no way connected with the subject. I am always glad to hear the gentleman on any other subject. I am a non-agitator, and am opposed to his agitating that question. I know that he has an unfortunate weakness which disables him from discussing anything without bringing it in.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire understands that the question is on the reference to a committee.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the Chair understands the question from my remarks. The honorable Senator from Mississippi should remember that we have not all had so much experience on these questions as he has had, and possibly some of us have not heard so much about them. I was referring to these things not in a mere light and frivolous way, but as one of the series of advantages in which the Senate is placed, by which it can consider the subject irrespective of all extraneous considerations. But to come to the naked merits of the question, I ask, with great deference, any of the older members of the Senate—I would not have spoken, being a young man, had not the young gentleman from Mississippi set the example—I ask any of the old or young members of the Senate, and middle-aged ones too, if they know of an instance in which a Senator has presented his credentials in the ordinary form who has been refused his seat? I put this question entirely irrespective of the ulterior merits of this case. How was it in the case of the honorable Senator from Illinois? A question arose there; an objection was made, and the Senator stood in his seat holding in his hand evidence which would disqualify him just as much as if five hundred contestants had been here. That fact was known to the Senate; and yet, in the face of it, the Senator was unanimously admitted to take his oath and his seat, and then in a few days an investigation was had. But while the contest is going on, the individual presenting the common evidence which you and I and every member of the Senate have—the certificate from the executive officer of the Commonwealth—is entitled to his seat.

The honorable Senator from Florida comes within the category. I presume it is not known to one quarter or one half of the Senate, whether, in the various States of the Union there is any statute authorizing the Governor to certify the proceedings of the Legislature. I do not know that there is such a one in my State. I doubt if there be. But that is not the question. The question is, whether it is the ordinary evidence—the evidence upon which the Senate ordinarily acts. They do not know whether there is any act of the Legislature of the State authorizing the Chief Magistrate to present the certificate. You have just sworn in one Senator [Mr. FISH] who presented no certificate from the Governor of his State. He simply presented the evidence of the doings of the two houses of the Legislature. The gentleman from Florida, I presume, presents the ordinary evidence which Senators from that State present. It seems to me, that if we adhere to the course always pursued heretofore—that is, that the gentleman having prima facie evidence shall take his seat—we do not confirm him in his seat a moment, or prejudice the claims of the contestant. I hope this course will be adhered to, and that the Senator from Florida will be allowed to take his seat, and then let the thing take the course suggested by the Senator from Indiana. But it seems to me that until he has taken his seat we are departing from the usual course of the Senate.

I am not a great stickler for States rights—I mean in the popular, cant sense of the phrase. I am not one of those who believe that we are thirty-one sovereign States. I believe the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Foote] does. I do not believe in that magniloquent idea of State sovereignty. Still, I think there is some respect due to the States, and that the courtesy with which the Senators from the States are always treated on presenting prima facie evidence, should govern the Senate with respect to the honorable Senator from Florida. It seems to me that he should take his seat, and that the matter should then take the course suggested by the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SEWARD. I think there is no doubt about the principle, that a person who presents prima facie evidence of his election as a Senator must be admitted. We all agree about that. The question here in this case, however, is, whether there are not two persons presenting such evidence in support of conflicting claims.

The Senator from Florida, [Mr. MORTON,] in behalf of one candidate, presents the Governor's certificate of election, or, what is to the same effect, a commission founded on an election or appointment by the Legislature. Such evidence has been received by the Senate as prima facie from the earliest history of the Government, and therefore, if unopposed, would be ample and adequate now.

But the same Senator presents, in behalf of another candidate, certified proceedings of the Legislature of Florida, which, he claims, show that he was duly chosen or appointed by that body. This form of evidence has always been accepted by the Senate also. No Senator from the State of New York ever brought a commission or certificate from the Governor. All of them have brought here credentials given by the Legislature, or certificates by their officers, authenticating their action, and nothing more.

Thus each candidate submits sufficient prima facie evidence, and they are equal in position. This is so, subject to one question. The legislative certificate, after reciting what Mr. YULEE claims to be an election, shows that the presiding officer decided that there was no election, and the Legislature proceeded to a new election. But that involves the question, whether what had already been done constituted an election or not. It is understood that fifty-eight members of the Legislature attended: twenty-nine voted for Mr. YULEE, and twenty-nine cast blank ballots. If these be counted as adverse ballots, then Mr. YULEE was not elected. If they be counted as no ballots, or as nothing, then he was elected. Now, I have no judgment formed on that question. The bias of my mind is adverse to the latter view. But it is a question, a real question, a grave question. I do not see how I can vote for the admission of the candidate holding the Governor's certificate, without deciding this question, which I wish to hear discussed. In order to do exact justice, therefore, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to refer to a select committee.

I do not see that the precedent in the case of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] touches this question. That Senator presented his credentials, and there was no adverse claimant. If I recollect aright, there was alleged to be evidence that he was not qualified to accept the place; but there was no question as to his having been elected or appointed to it by the Legislature of the State. There was but one certificate, or one prima facie case, made out. On these considerations, as at present advised, I shall vote for the motion of the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CLAY. Feeble as I am, I cannot refrain from making a few additional observations. There is no doubt of the duty and the right of this body to determine all questions of elections of its members. The question is as to the method of doing this, and that question has been settled, I believe, by every deliberative body upon earth. It is this: If there is a contest, by two claiming the same seat, the party having the return takes the seat, and the other party presents his petition claiming it; that petition is referred to a committee; it is reported upon by the committee and acted upon by the body. Now, one very great error committed, as I conceive, by the gentleman who last addressed you, was to treat that Journal as an election—to consider it as a credential. It is no such thing. When you look into it, you find twenty-nine votes given for one person, and twenty-nine blanks. Upon that result having been ascertained, the presiding officer considering that there was no election, the Legislature proceeded to elect, and the gentleman who now claims to take the oath was elected. To call that first proceeding, therefore, an election; and to call that election a credential, is, I think, a great abuse of terms. The only evidence of any election which we have, is the certificate of the Governor. And here, allow me to say, with great deference to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] that I think a great error in his argument was to assume two classes of evidence, and then to bring before the Senate prima facie evidence and plenary evidence, and the plenary evidence overruling the prima facie, that that prima facie evidence should be deprived of any effect. Now, I deny, in the first place, that plenary evidence is before us, legally and formally, according to that usage which constitutes a law of deliberative bodies. But let us push this argument a little further. In the case, so often mentioned, of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] there was plenary evidence, according to the argument of the Senator from Georgia; there was the evidence before the Senate of his being an alien at the time of his election, but there was also the prima facie evidence of his having been elected by the Legislature of his State. And how did the Senate treat this description of evidence, plenary and prima facie? Why, they did not look at the plenary, as it has been called; they were governed solely by the prima facie. They admitted him to his seat; and were not governed by the plenary, because the time had not arrived for it to have any effect. That time was after the Senator had received the oath and taken his seat, and when the question of the validity of his election should come up before the Committee of Elections, or some other mode of investigation. We might push this a little further: Take the case of a member of the House of Representatives. A presents his return of his election. B presents a record of evidence—plenary, according to the argument of the Senator from Georgia—showing that A had not been legally elected, but that, if deprived of certain illegal votes which had been given to him, he would be found to have obtained only a minority, while B, the contestant, had really a right to the return, and therefore a right to his seat. Here is the prima facie evidence, and here is the plenary evidence; but did you ever hear any instance of that kind where a legislative body, upon the presentation of the return, would go into that which is called the plenary evidence, and decide upon the case as to who was entitled to his seat? Did you ever hear of it, except perhaps in the memorable instance referred to, which arose from considerations to which I shall not advert because they are unpleasant? But invariably the practice is to administer the oath to the man having in his pocket the return, and let him who contests the seat come forward, by petition or some other mode, and claim it. Here, I say, if you go into the journal of the Legislature of Florida, which I think is entirely out of order and informal, it proves there was no election in the first instance, and therefore no credentials. It proves, according to the legislative sense, that there was no election. The Legislature afterwards proceeded to make an election; and the Governor has given the certificate of it. The only question which can arise at any stage of this proceeding, even after it is referred to a committee, is whether you will overrule the decision of the Legislature, and declare, contrary to their judgment, that an election was made of Mr. YULEE, when they declared that there was no election, and proceeded to elect.

Mr. BRIGHT. I did not intend, by the motion I made, to indicate an opinion as to the right of either party claiming the seat. My object was to expedite the business of the body. I see, however, from indications around me, that the motion I made will be calculated perhaps to embarrass Senators and prolong the debate. Believing that the contestant in this case will not be at all prejudiced by permitting the gentleman having the certificate to be sworn in, I shall withdraw my motion. I do it somewhat at the instance of the contestant himself. I have no objection to the gentleman taking the oath.

Mr. CLAY. I move, then, that the gentleman whose credentials have been presented, be sworn in, according to the usage of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY then took the oath of office.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the letter presented by the contestant at the last executive session of the Senate, together with the record and other papers relative to the matter, be referred to a select committee of five.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GWIN, the election of the special committee was postponed until one o'clock to-morrow.

HOURLY MEETING.

On motion by Mr. CLEMENS, it was Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian, until otherwise ordered.

NOTICE OF ORGANIZATION.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTICES.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce—

A bill to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports, since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union;

A bill to establish a branch mint of the United States in the State of California;

A bill to provide for the location and construction of a central national railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean;

A bill to reduce the rates of postage on newspapers, and to establish a uniform rate of postage on letters throughout the United States;

A bill to establish a line of ocean mail steamers from San Francisco in California, via the Sandwich Islands, to Shanghai in China;

A bill to pay the expenses incurred for the suppression of Indian hostilities in California;

A bill granting the right of way for, and to aid in the construction of, a line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean;

A bill to create a Board of Commissioners for the settlement of claims for military services in the State of California;

A bill to establish a navy-yard and naval depot in California;

A bill to establish assay offices of the Mint of the United States at Sacramento City and Stockton, in California; and

A bill to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of donation privileges therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHASE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in that State.

Mr. WALKER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce—

A bill to authorize the Governor of the State of Wisconsin to select and locate other lands in lieu of such as had been sold, in the tract granted to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, in Wisconsin;

A bill to grant to the State of Wisconsin a quantity of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Milwaukee in Wisconsin, by way of Watertown, to Prairie La Corsee, on the Mississippi river;

A bill to grant to the State of Wisconsin a quantity of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fond du Lac to Janesville in Wisconsin;

A bill to cede the public lands of the United States to the States respectively in which they are situated; and

A bill to increase the jurisdiction of the United States district court for the district of Wisconsin.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi river.

Mr. JONES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to grant land to the State of Iowa, to aid said State in the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to Keokuk, and from Davenport to the Missouri river.

He also presented the petition of Henry M. Rice, praying for a grant of land for the construction of a railroad from the St. Louis river of Lake Superior, via St. Paul, in Minnesota Territory, to Dubuque, in the State of Iowa.

RECEPTION AND ENTERTAINMENT OF KOSSUTH.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I beg leave to notify the Senate that to-morrow, as soon as I can do so, after the reception of the President's Message, I shall ask leave to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the reception and entertainment of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary. I may venture to remark, that I shall do so in unison with the Administration, and somewhat at the instance of the Secretary of State, and after full consultation with as many of my friends in this body as I have had an opportunity of conferring with. I would like to get an informal order for the printing of this resolution, so that honorable gentlemen may have a chance of reading it and seeing that there is no mischief in it whatever; so that it may to-morrow morning be unanimously adopted.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was ordered to be printed, as follows:

Joint Resolution in relation to the reception and entertainment of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, in the United States.

Be it, &c., That a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, to consist of — members of the Senate and — members of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the presiding officers of the respective Houses to make suitable arrangements for the reception of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, on his arrival in the United States, and to communicate to him assurances of the profound respect entertained for him by the people of the United States; and to tender to him, on the part of Congress, and in the name of the people of the United States, the hospitalities of the Metropolis of the Union.

PRINTING.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was

Resolved, That instead of the number of copies heretofore ordered to be printed, the usual number of copies of the Legislative Journal, Reports of Committees, Executive and Miscellaneous documents to be printed, shall be 1400 copies until further order of the Senate.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 1, 1851.

This being the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the meeting of Congress, the members elect of the House of Representatives, at 12 o'clock m., were called to order by RICHARD M. YOUNG, Esq., Clerk; and the roll being called, the following members answered to their names, viz:

The CLERK announced that two hundred and eighteen members had answered to their names, and that there was a quorum present.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the House proceed to the election of Speaker viva voce; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe nominations are now in order?

The CLERK. They are in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL nominated Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that nominations for Speaker are not necessary.

The CLERK. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Against the will of the House, then, I am certainly not disposed to make any nomination. I desire simply to say, that for one, I shall vote for LINN BOYD, of Kentucky, for Speaker—not because he has received the nomination of a caucus, but because I know him to be a sound Democrat, and a tried and thorough compromise and Union man. As such shall vote for him for Speaker.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to say that I feel very happy in concurring with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and shall vote for LINN BOYD for Speaker, because he is the nominee of the Democratic party.

CAUCUS NOMINATIONS—THE COMPROMISE.

Mr. STANLY. I should be glad to know if there is any difficulty about the nomination between our friends upon the other side of the House?

A VOICE: None whatever.

Mr. STANLY. But something is the matter.

A VOICE. Oh, we will settle that by a vote.

Mr. STANLY. But I have heard of some trouble about these compromise matters; and since the ball has been started, I should be glad if the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] or the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] would give the country some little information upon this subject. We want to know how far a coalition which has existed elsewhere, is to be brought forward and sanctioned by the votes of this House. One gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has been nominated by a gentleman from Ohio. There has been a secession from our ranks on account of the adoption of the compromise measures. I want to know how far the compromise measures have been repudiated by our friends on the other side of the House, for I understand they have been repudiated.

Mr. SAVAGE. It is not an uncommon thing for individuals to console themselves in their misfortunes by seeking out the misfortunes of others. I imagine that if the gentleman would turn to his own side of the House, he would find ample need of consolation. [Laughter.] I am not aware of any misfortune in our ranks.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!" from all parts of the Hall.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know that it is proper to discuss the merits of the various gentlemen who may be presented as candidates for the Speakership. I do not design doing so. I desire simply to say, that as for the gentleman whose name I have presented to the House, he is as true a friend to the Union as there is in the Union; and I believe he is just as good a Whig as can be found in the Union. As to the compromise measures, I hope those gentlemen who are so much opposed to agitation will not bring forward those measures for discussion so early in the session. I am against agitation just at this particular time. I do not want to plunge this House into another revolution such as we had in our efforts to organize the last Congress. I would suggest, therefore, to the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] and to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and to my colleague, [Mr. CARTTER,] that perhaps the less said upon this matter just now the better. When the time comes, should gentlemen insist upon agitation, we will be ready for it. We will take care not to throw the first stone.

Mr. CARTTER made some remark inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. CAMPBELL continued. I have not said one word in relation to the merits of the compromise measures, because I do not wish to get up agitation so early in the session. We shall have enough of it after a while, but I do not think it prudent to begin now. I hope, therefore, that the roll will be called.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]
Mr. BROOKS. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] has tauntingly advised us Whigs before we proceed to a vote, that instead of reproaching the Democratic party, we first heal the differences in our own ranks. It is good advice; and but for that advice from the other side of the House I should not have said a word upon this occasion, nor have had the opportunity I now have of informing the gentleman that the breaches in the Whig party have been healed. I now have the pleasure of informing not only that gentleman, but all others associated with him in his party connection, that the Whigs of this Congress assembled this morning in large numbers—

Several MEMBERS. How many?

Mr. BROOKS. Enough to give a decided and emphatic expression for the Whig party—

Cries of "How many were there?"

Mr. BROOKS. There were fifty or sixty present, and by a clear unequivocal resolution they have acquiesced in the compromise measures. [Laughter.] Well, I see that gentlemen laugh at the paucity of our numbers! Ay, it is our misfortune that we have no one hundred and forty members upon the floor of the House, as they have; but it is not charitable to laugh at us for that. We have but seventy or eighty Whig members in all, but it is probable that we could largely increase the number if we were no more particular about principles than they are. Nearly all of those who were in the city this morning assembled in the Capitol, and expressed their opinion in favor of acquiescence in the finality of the compromise measures. Our breaches have thus been healed. But how is it with the gentlemen upon the other side of the House? How is it that Whig northern men, who are the defenders of these compromise measures, are deserted by Democratic gentlemen from other portions of the country who profess great devotion to them, but who are unwilling to sustain and defend those measures, or to make any record that they do sustain them? I have no doubt that the gentlemen upon the other side can, upon the single principle set forth or made known by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] succeed in effecting an election: for the honorable gentleman from Tennessee who opened the ball, says he votes for Mr. BOYD because he is in favor of the compromise measures. I have no doubt that a very large majority of this House is in favor of acquiescing in those measures. The Whigs now are nearly all upon that platform. If that be the only principle upon which the gentleman from Kentucky is nominated by the gentleman from Tennessee, he shall have my vote with all my heart. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] rises and says that he votes for Mr. BOYD not because he is a friend of the compromise measures, but because he is the nominee of the Democratic caucus. Here is a distinction and a decided difference, and all the difference in the world between the Democracy of Ohio and Tennessee. I should like to know in which State is taught the true Democratic faith? I should like to know by which of the expounders I am to be educated? There must be others, even Democrats, groping as much in the dark as myself. I see in the seats just before me two highly honorable and very distinguished gentlemen in the northern Democratic ranks, [Mr. RANTOUL and Mr. CLEVELAND,] and if the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] teaches the true faith, he exiles them from the Democratic party at once; but if the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] be the exponent, they are the real Democrats, and the gentleman from Tennessee himself is but an interloper in the ranks. Wisconsin, too, and the gentlemen who represent it, are deeply interested in having this dispute settled at once. And so are other Democratic States, provided Democracy does not mean one thing at the North and altogether another thing south of this. At the opening of a Congress, with a Democratic majority of sixty in this House, we have a candidate for Speaker formally presented to us upon principles utterly variant. Tennessee presents him upon the principle that he is in favor of the compromise measures, and Ohio not that he is in favor of them, but only because he is the nominee of the Democratic party!

Now, it is of some considerable importance to us from New York, upon all sides of this issue, to know where we stand before we begin to stand at all. The gentlemen upon the other side have represented their party as discordant and belligerent upon measures which, in their vital importance to this country, rise above all party, and before which all party issues dwindle into insignificance. It is important, therefore, for me to know where I am to stand, and how I am to vote, before I vote at all. If the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOYD,] who is the nominee of the other side, is the candidate only of the compromise measures, as the gentleman from Tennessee presents him, I am ready to vote for him, and he shall cheerfully have my vote, with all my heart in the bargain. If, on the other hand, he is presented as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] presents him, as the nominee of my distinguished colleague [Mr. PRESTON KING,] who figured conspicuously in the Democratic caucus, (as his talents enable him to figure every where with distinction,) and of other northern Democratic gentlemen from our State, who, with pleasure, no doubt, follow his lead in this matter, why, it is impossible for me to vote for him. I want to vote for a man who is in favor of acquiescence in the compromise measures, and not for any candidate the nominee of a party that is opposed to them. I think it a matter of the very gravest importance; that the organ of this the popular branch of the Government, should, by his election, and the mode and manner of it, be made to express the opinion that the painful and startling issues of the last Congress cannot be reopened in this. I think it due to the North and the South both, that they should this day know, in the nomination or selection of a Speaker, that the slavery firebrand is to be played successfully with no longer. I think, if I may be allowed to speak so freely, it is not only dishonest but dangerous for a party with sixty majority in this House, to organize by pandering one way to abolition Democracy North, and to slavery Democracy South. It is riding the wind to reap the whirlwind, and it is a whirlwind that some of us Whigs, at great personal sacrifice in the last Congress, quelled once, and that we do not want to be called upon to quell too often. It is of importance, therefore, for all of us to know where we are, who we are, and where we are tending. If the Democratic party is one thing in Tennessee and altogether another thing in Ohio; one thing in Massachusetts and Connecticut and another thing in Pennsylvania; if it be nothing but a struggle for the spoils, and means to use the slavery excitement, sectionally and at all hazards, to get them; if it be thus a sacrifice of the country for the purpose of obtaining the organization of this House or the Presidency; if Democracy be, in the Southern country, the agitation of the slavery question so as to overthrow the Union, and in the northern country abolition, to bear down all of us Whigs who are defenders of the compromise bills—if that be Democracy, why, it certainly is not in my power to vote for any nominee of the Democratic caucus. On the contrary, upon the single principle that the gentleman from Tennessee has indicated, I could give that nominee, with great pleasure, my vote. I hope, therefore, to hear from gentlemen on the other side upon what platform they do really intend to stand their candidate; whether he is to stand upon one leg or two legs, or whether he go like a quadruped, walking on all fours. For that gentleman himself I have the highest respect. I know where he has stood, and what he has been, and I stood with him, side by side. I have not one word to say against him. I have no right to judge what is or what ought to be his position. But I know enough of him to feel sure, that if he is unchanged since the last Congress, he can receive no pleasure in taking a nomination from a party which has refused to indorse those measures of which he was so earnest an advocate, and in the passage of which he took so conspicuous a part. If a caucus means anything, it means to express a coincidence of opinion; but from the demonstrations on the other side of the House, it would seem that there was no such coincidence of opinion. There is, then, as one of the gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. B. meant Mr. JONES] insinuated, disorder and discord upon the other side of the House; harmony and concord upon this.

Mr. SAVAGE. The gentleman totally misrepresents me. I made no such statements or admission. I know of no party misfortunes among the Democracy. I merely stated that the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] not finding any comfort in his own party, was looking for consolation abroad, by imagining some one more unfortunate than himself. His conduct is good evidence as to the condition of your party, but none as to mine.

Mr. BROOKS. I have only to say, in conclusion, that the Whig party has, in its congressional caucus, taken that sort of action which presents to the country a harmonious and united front, and on that front they mean to stand. If any portion of the Whig party are dissatisfied with our position, let them secede and go over to the other side, where all sorts of principles are likely to prevail, or can find a refuge and accommodation, because no expression of opinion has been made, or can be made, so different are the opinions of that party in the northern and southern sections of this Union.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Clerk, I was more than gratified to learn from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] that the Whig party had healed all their old difficulties, and had united for the purpose of supporting the compromise measures which passed Congress—the slave bill and all. I understand that he has stated it as a fact before the country, that the Whig party of the North are now opposed to agitation, and are perfectly willing to execute every article in the compromise, slave bill and all. I understand, then, that there is no division of opinion amongst the Whigs of the North upon that subject. Do I understand that declaration to be made unequivocally?

Mr. BROOKS. I will say that the Whig caucus, this morning, by an almost unanimous expression of opinion, gave utterance to an acquiescence of the compromise measures, and that henceforth opposition to that resolution here will be disorganization.

Mr. MEADE, (continuing.) Mr. Clerk, that explanation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is fraught with a good many things addressed to the reflection of the South, and the other portions of this Union who are in favor of the execution of the provisions of the compromise. I understand the Whig party of the North—those who were in attendance here this morning in caucus—represented probably about one fourth portion of that party. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the northern Whigs who attended that caucus will undertake to declare to this Union that their constituents, or even a majority of their constituents, will sustain them? or, in other words, that they reflect the sentiments of the large body of the Whig party of the North? and that that party are now prepared to stop agitation upon the slavery question, and to carry out faithfully the provisions in relation to the returning of fugitive slaves? Do I understand that pledge now to be given to the country?

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will permit me. The best explanation that I can make is to read the resolution that was adopted.

Mr. MEADE. I have just now said that the Whig resolutions were passed by the Whigs of the South united with a small fraction of the Whigs of the North. That is what I understand to be the case. The whole body in attendance upon that occasion represented about one third part of the Whig party of the Union.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the honorable gentleman permit me to add, that the majority of that caucus—a large majority—was from the northern States. There are not many Whig members in this House. The number of members there was between fifty and sixty. At the Democratic caucus there were eighty-three members out of one hundred and forty-two. I will read the resolution that was adopted, with the permission of the gentleman:

Resolved, That we regard the series of acts known as the adjustment measures, as forming in their mutual dependence and connection a system of compromise the most conciliating and the best for the entire country that could be obtained from conflicting sectional interests and opinions, and that therefore they ought to be adhered to and carried into full execution, as a final settlement in principle and substance of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman allow me to speak a word in explanation?

Mr. MEADE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Clerk, I was at that caucus. I moved to lay these resolutions upon the table. I stated, in connection with that motion, that I would not be bound by these resolutions. [Laughter and applause.] In my judgment there were about forty members there. I did not count them. I will further say, that in the vote to lay the resolutions upon the table, which was on a division by ayes and noes, I judge about one third were in favor of laying them on the table. [Laughter.] I will say in conclusion, Mr. Clerk, that I deem it my duty to have the facts known as they are. If I am called a seceder, so be it. I am a Whig, have always been a Whig, and probably will ever be a Whig. I mean to stand firmly where I always have stood. [Applause.] I shall not be bound by the resolutions of others, passed beforehand. I mean to act standing upon my own feet in this House, and elsewhere.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman to order, as destroying the harmony of the Whig party.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] seceded from the Whig caucus, and can, therefore, know nothing of the final action.

Mr. FOWLER. I remained there until all action was concluded upon the resolutions. The whole of the members of the caucus then went out.

Mr. MEADE. I have, Mr. Clerk, but a few words more to say. It appears, then, that about forty Whigs were in attendance upon that occasion. It is fair to presume that twenty of them were from the South, and it is fair to presume that every southern Whig voted for that resolution; and take the one third who voted against the resolution, and you have twenty-five; twenty southern Whigs from twenty-five, will leave five northern Whigs sustaining them. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Clerk, it is a very significant commentary upon the action of the Whig party this morning, in caucus, that one of the Whigs from the North nominated for the office of Speaker another Whig from the North, for whose Whiggery he vouches, and which I have no doubt all his colleagues from the North will vouch for. One Whig nominates another for the Speakership, who is known to be in favor of agitation and of repealing the only feature, as I deem it, in that compromise, beneficial to my constituents, and the South generally.

Now, sir, I know the purpose for which this motion is made, and that purpose I wish to expose. It is made, sir, for political capital at the South, in the approaching presidential election—to obtain Southern votes. The people of the South understand the Whigs of the North. My constituents understand them as well as I do. We know that there are some honorable exceptions in that party from the general rule that controls them. We know that a large body of that party, under the auspices of a celebrated Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] are opposed to the execution of the fugitive slave bill, and that they have had conventions, time after time, in which they have avowed their determination to have it repealed. All the talents of Daniel Webster, and those acting with him at the North, have been unable to allay the storm which that fugitive slave bill has created there. While we know well that a majority of the Whig party at the North are unsound and untrue to the compromise, we also know that a large body of the Democratic party at the North are faithful to the compromise—especially those who stand so prominently before the community there as to be known to the people of the South. I can allude to such men as Marcy, Dickinson, Buchanan, Dallas, Douglas, and others whom it is unnecessary for me now to enumerate.

I have named some of those who are the acknowledged leaders of the Democratic party at the North. We know that they are the true friends of this Union. I know, sir, though I was opposed to the series of compromise measures, that if justice is to be done the South, it must be expected from, and it will come from, that quarter, assisted by a few conservative Whigs, who are battling gloriously (whose services we are willing to acknowledge) in favor of the preservation of the Constitution, of the Union, and of the rights of my constituents. If the Whig party of the South do not intend to shut their eyes and willfully to stalk in the dark regardless of the stumbling-blocks in their way, I foresee their destiny, and the end to which they must come. If true and loyal to the interests of the South; if true and loyal to the Union, I say their destiny is with us—the Democracy of the North and the South. They must cooperate with the Democratic party; laying aside the minor principles which have hitherto divided them, the Whig party must unite with the Democrats of the North and South in securing those blessings which they were so eloquent in describing to their constituents at home. We, sir, are not to be gulled in this mode by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] If the gentleman had not made the speech which he has, I was perfectly willing to have acknowledged him as a friend of the compromise and of this Union; but when I know the effect of that speech will be probably to induce some of the people of the South to believe in his declarations—to infer from the passage of that resolution by two thirds of one third of his party, that they intend to abide by the measures of compromise, I felt it my duty to rise in my place and undeceive my people, and to let them know it is but finesse, an artful contrivance for the purpose of gulling them in the approaching presidential contest. That was the object. Does the gentleman intend to say to my constituents, in the face of the numerous Whig conventions at the North in which they expressly declared their determination to repeal the only feature in that compromise that is beneficial to us, that they will execute it? Does he hope to impose upon their credulity to the extent of making them believe that the Whig party of the North are sound upon this subject? So far from being dissatisfied with the speech of the gentleman if I thought he had good grounds to make that speech upon if he was sustained by the facts, I should rejoice over his declarations; then I should hope that both of the great parties at the North were sound upon this question. Let me but know the fact that a large majority of the people of the North, both Whig and Democratic, are in favor of the execution of this law, and are willing to let us rest in peace without further agitation, and that this question was regarded as finally settled by this compromise, against which I voted, and would again if it was to come up,—I say I should then cheerfully proclaim before the nation that I would abide all of its features. I do not believe, neither do the Whig party here nor any party believe, that the declarations of the gentleman of New York, purporting to give this assurance to the South, have any grounds to rest upon. The fact is not so; we know the fact is not so. As I have said before, the commentary upon the declarations of the gentleman from New York—that the Whig party is in favor of the execution of the fugitive slave law—is to be found in the nomination made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] bringing forward as a candidate for this high office one who is known to be opposed to most of its features, and particularly that which secures to the South their constitutional rights. We know, sir—

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman will allow me to explain, I desire to say to him and the House, that the presentation by me of the name of Mr. STEVENS had no connection whatever with the caucus referred to by the gentleman from New York. I was not in the caucus; with it my presentation had no connection.

Mr. MEADE. I consider the gentleman as a Whig, and his nominee as a Whig. He vouches for him, and many would of course vote for him as being a Whig. Now, the country shall not be deceived by this ruse practised by the Whig caucus. If I understand aright, that subject was brought before the Democratic caucus, evening before last, (at which I was not present, nor was I in the city,) and was laid upon the table as being the appropriate subject for the consideration of the people in convention.

Several MEMBERS. That is it! That is it!

Mr. MEADE. That it was a question for the people afterwards to be assembled in Democratic convention, who will take this subject in hand and will proclaim to the world the opinions upon which Northern and Southern Democrats stand. While I know, sir, that there are Free-Soil agitators who call themselves Democrats, I for one, sir, as a member of the Democratic party, who will be willing to carry out in good faith this compromise which has been passed, but which I believe has been detrimental to us, repudiate every soul of them who are in favor of the agitation of the fugitive slave bill. They are not part and parcel of what I conceive to be the legitimate Democratic party of this Union. They are repudiated by the leading men of the North, whom we all know at the South, and in whom we can trust. These resolutions it was the policy of the Whig party to take up for the purpose of imposing upon the South the idea that their own party had been true upon this question. These resolutions, I again repeat, in the Democratic caucus, consisting of a bare majority, were laid upon the table as improper to be acted upon in a private meeting for another purpose. Sir, we wanted no declaration of opinion or principle by which we should be actuated here in this Congress. The Democratic party in this Congress are known to be united on the fugitive slave bill. I cast out of view the few dozen Free-Soilers and agitators who pass for Democrats at home, and who come here as members of the Democratic party. I do not call them members of the Democratic party. I, for one, do not view them as such. When they become willing to abide this settlement and to regard the compromise measures as the final settlement of the slavery question, they may come in the Democratic party, and unite with that party in carrying out the other principles that characterize it. These resolutions were taken up, as I have stated before, with a view to contrast the action of the Whig caucus, containing about one fourth of the Whigs of the North, and for the very purpose of creating a false belief at the South that we had rejected and they had passed them. On any proper occasion I will venture to affirm there is not a dozen Democrats here who will vote against resolutions in favor of executing the fugitive slave bill. They were taken up by the Whig party this morning with a view of imposing their rotten party and its principles upon the South—of deceiving them. The trick will not succeed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Clerk, I have heard it said that the soldier who in the hour of battle deserts, is sure to be the loudest after the victory in proclaiming his joy; that he is most anxious to be the vigilant sentinel, after the danger is past, in guarding the camp; and he is always the first when on guard to decry danger to the camp, and raise false alarms. This is not only true in relation to the soldier, but it is true in relation to the politician.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] comes forward to-day as the leader, as the especial champion of the measures passed by the last Congress, and known as the compromise measures.

The compromise measures embrace six distinct propositions. For five of them there was but little opposition from the North, and against two of the five—the admission of California and the abolition of the slave trade in this District—no gentleman representing a free State cast his vote. The only one of the series of measures thus passed that was distasteful and violently assailed at the North, was the fugitive slave bill. When the time came for Northern men to assume responsibility, the gentleman now so fierce, so bold, so valiant, found it convenient not to record his vote; he fled the flag under which he now thinks all true patriots, all who love the country and the Union, should do battle—he being leader.

Mr. BROOKS, (Mr. R. yielding the floor.) I voted upon that question the same way General Cass, and Mr. Douglas from his own State, voted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New York is certainly apprised of the fact that Judge Douglas was confined to his bed by sickness at the time the bill passed. Does he pretend that he was unable to attend the House at the time the fugitive slave bill was under discussion, or when it was being voted upon? This hope, if such hope be entertained—this excuse, if it is pleaded, is cut off,—the gentleman was in the House on the same day, and voted just before the vote was taken upon that bill; he was in the House and voted upon the next proposition that succeeded that bill. Does the gentleman say that he could not have voted upon that bill if he had desired so to do? Does he deny that he was here? If denied, I am prepared to show, by the Journal, all that I have stated.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman should be consistent in his charges, and not say I was both in my seat and fled the House. I admit the fact of not voting on the final passage. The gentleman will find me upon every vote facilitating action upon the bill. I have only to say, in addition to that, that there are reasons which I have given elsewhere for not voting on the final passage, and among others that the bill was never printed for this House, but driven through under the previous question, without giving us time to read what the bill was. Mr. B. said he regretted that he did not vote for the bill on its final passage; and he regretted it as the most unfortunate act of his political life, because, in addition to defending the bill in its details, whether he approved of all these details or not, he had been obliged to enter into long and detailed personal explanations of his reasons why he did not vote for the bill on its final passage. When an act of Congress was to be defended as he had defended this act, and a public man was to be attacked upon it as he had been attacked, whether he approved it or not, the wisest way, experience had shown him, was to take the bull by the horns and walk off with him at once.

Mr. B. was sorry to hear that Judge Douglas had been then confined to his bed so as to deprive him of the power of leaving a record in the Senate, as he (Mr. B.) had left in the House. But it was very remarkable that every Northern Democratic Senator, save only the two Senators from Iowa, was equally sick on that day, and was also confined to his bed. The malady was general, and only Iowa escaped the contagion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman says he is sorry that he did not give that bill his support. I have no doubt of it, sir. The soldier who deserts his flag is always sorry, after the victory is won, that he was not there to help fight the battle. The gentleman, by refusing to vote upon the bill, placed himself in that condition (so desirable with some politicians) to avail himself of advantage either way, while he was unwilling to hazard anything by the course he pursued. If the bill was odious to his constituents, he could say, I could not find it in my conscience to vote for it. If the returning sense of justice made it acceptable, he could say, I had not time to read what the bill was.

The gentleman thus situated is selected to announce to us the fact, that the Whig party have adopted by their caucuses these measures as the platform upon which alone they are willing to stand; and in the execution of his mission he denounces as abolitionists and secessionists the whole Democratic party, because they have seen fit and proper to defer all these questions to the appropriate tribunal, the National Convention, which is soon to assemble, to be considered and acted upon. As a Democrat, I have fought for these measures when the gentleman from New York was enlisted under the banner of Free-Soil, going quite as far as him who went furthest.

His conversion has been sudden, and, like all new converts, his zeal is very great. I ask the gentleman if modesty should not moderate his denunciations of those who were so lately fighting side by side with him in the Abolition ranks? Who, sir, first joined hands and forces in the North with the Abolitionists? The Whig party; and by their votes and their aid they trampled down and beat the Democrats in more than half the northern States; and while it is true they forced some of the Democrats to alliances with Abolitionists, the only men who at the North opposed Abolitionism were Democrats. When I first entered Congress, not one Northern Whig Representative could be found to place himself upon record, except under the lead and side by side with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS;] while there were many Democrats from the same section (fully half of them) who opposed here, and before their constituents, Abolitionism and Free-Soil in all its shapes and phases: I am one of the number. Sir, it was but recently the whole Whig press of the North, among whom was the gentleman, were in the habit of calling me doughface, because I could not and would not bow to this deity, once so supreme with the gentleman.

With the past before me, the gentleman will pardon me—I beg his forgiveness—if I decline to follow in his lead; and I hope he will indulge me while I say to him, that he had better see that he is sound himself before he pronounces others so unsound; that if he will be content to serve in the ranks awhile, and does good service, by and by we may promote him to command, as the reward of skill, industry, and zeal.

But, sir, the gentleman says the Whig party in caucus have, with great unanimity, agreed to acquiesce in the compromise measures; and he says that caucus was made up of mostly Northern men. He also says that Democrats are afraid to put themselves upon record for these measures. The gentleman's fancies are fine—his facts unfortunate. He was a member of this House when those measures passed, and he knows that they received two Democratic votes to one Whig.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, (Mr. RICHARDSON yielding the floor,) said, that during the progress of this discussion, he had analyzed the vote by which the fugitive slave law had passed the House of Representatives, and found, upon examination of the Journal, that eighty-two Democrats voted for that bill, and only twenty-six Whigs; and this, too, in a House composed of about an equal number of Whigs and Democrats.

Out of seventy-six Whig Representatives from the North, ONLY THREE VOTED FOR THE BILL. And out of only fifty Democratic Representatives from the North, TWENTY-EIGHT RECORDED THEIR VOTES FOR IT.

The State of New York had, at that time, thirty-two Whig Representatives upon this floor, and not one of them voted for this bill; while the Hon. Hiram Walden, the only Democratic Representative from the State, recorded his vote for it.

In the Senate, there was not a Northern Whig vote for the bill. And, sir, if gentlemen will take the trouble to analyze the vote by which the other bills composing the adjustment were passed, they will find, as already stated by my honorable friend from Illinois, that there were about two Democrats to one Whig that voted for those bills. When these facts have gone to the country, the people will be enabled to determine from them to whom they are indebted for the passage of these measures and the settlement of those vexed and agitating questions.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Are those three Whigs in this House? They were in the last House.

Mr. HARRIS. I meant the House of Representatives when I used the term. But three Whigs of the last House voted for the fugitive slave bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. How many of those Democrats who voted for it have got back to this House?

Mr. HARRIS. There were more Democrats returned than Whigs. I see quite a number around me—I have not counted them—my friend Mr. RICHARDSON, and a number of others.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will with pleasure reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and I am under deep obligations to him for affording me the opportunity of placing this fact before the House and the country. Of the twenty-eight Democrats from the North who voted for the fugitive slave bill, twelve are members of this House, viz: Messrs. Bissell, Dimmick, Dunham, Fuller, Gorman, Hibbard, McLaughan, Peaslee, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Wildrick. Mr. Buell, of Michigan, was beaten by a Whig for the vote he gave for the bill, and it may be that this Whig was one of those Northern Whigs who, in caucus this morning, adopted the compromise as the Whig platform. Of the twenty-eight Northern Democrats who voted for this bill, fifteen were candidates for reelection, twelve elected, two defeated by Whigs, and one by a Democrat.

From all the districts in the North represented in the last Congress by those who voted for the bill, there are Representatives here as sound as their predecessors, save it be from the districts where Whigs have been returned. This is not all; a large majority of the Democrats of this Congress from the North are opposed to any and all disturbance of these measures, but they are for a full and faithful execution of all the laws of the land. But, sir, where are the Whigs from the North who supported the fugitive bill? There were but three of them, it is true; only one of them has been spared. Are gentlemen candid when they say the Northern Whig party, either at home or here, are sound upon these measures—Winthrop, Vinton, Johnson, bright shining lights, all true and sound? In what but name do they differ from the rankst Abolitionists in the land? They have but recently been the standard-bearers in their States of this party that now are in such love with the Compromise. When I am reduced to the alternative of selecting between them and Abolitionists, I could not make a choice. If there are any persons in this country who are deceived by these professions of Northern Whigs, except themselves, I am greatly mistaken. If any of our friends anywhere are deceived by this specious resolution, it is because they are anxious to be duped. If any portion of our Southern friends are disposed to unite their fortunes with those who are the real authors of all those difficulties that have agitated the country, they are more anxious to be duped and deceived than I think they are. It is for them to make their election.

I am unwilling that the recruit of yesterday shall dragoon me, after twenty years of contest with abolitionism. In all that I have done, I have been actuated by a sense of duty, and a desire to overthrow those whom I regarded as threatening the existence of our Government. And, in conclusion, I have to say to the honorable gentleman from New York and his Northern Whig friends, who with so much unanimity adopted the Compromise, that when they shall undo what they have done, or when they bring their party North to acquiesce in these measures in good faith, by acts instead of promises that they cannot and will not perform, the day of agitation is over here. I trust they have seen the error of their way, and intend in future to seek and follow in the path of duty.

Several MEMBERS. "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I have but a few words to say in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] and from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.] The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] has said in the course of his remarks that it is the destiny of the Southern Whigs to affiliate with the Democrats of the North.

M. MEADE. And of the South.

Mr. CABELL. When I left my home in the South, I did feel it was to be my destiny to affiliate with the Democracy of the North. I could not affiliate with the Democracy of the South. The Southern Democracy were, in my opinion, as wrong on many questions as the Northern Whigs. They were seeking to tear up the foundations of our Government, whilst the Abolitionists of the North were seeking to produce excitement there that would lead to the same result. I could not affiliate with the Disunionists and Secessionists of the South, or with the Abolitionists of the North—Whig or Democratic.

I came here believing that it was my destiny to affiliate with the Northern Democrats and such Southern Democrats as will stand by the Union and the Constitution as it is. For I had observed, in the course of my Congressional experience, that there were more sound men in the Congress of the United States upon this question, the Democratic party than among the Whigs, and I had confidence in their assurances for the future. I came here for the purpose of taking those men by the hand, regarding them as brothers, who were willing to stand with me by the Constitution of the United States. I will not mention individuals, or I might point to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] who has been named by the gentleman from Illinois, and to the gentleman himself, [Mr. RICHARDSON.] It was my expectation that I should act with those men. I was willing, and even expected, that I should cast my vote for the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BORN,] believing that he would be the nominee of the Democratic party; that that party, after all their professions on this subject, would indorse the compromise measures, which I feared the Whig party would not do. We had been told all over the South that the great Democratic party of the country was sound upon that question.

Mr. POLK, (interposing.) I wish to state a fact which has not been heretofore stated—that I introduced that resolution into the Democratic caucus, and that there was not a word uttered in that caucus in contradiction of the principles embraced in the resolution. The chief objection was as to the question of time, and, as it was not a full caucus, the objection was also raised, that it would not be right for a portion of the party to take action on a great national question of this character.

Mr. STANLY. How many were there in the caucus?

Mr. POLK. Eighty-nine were present, and I say, that of those eighty-nine, not one member gave utterance to a sentiment in contradiction of the principles embraced in the resolution. We have a right to ask for time, that we may have a full expression of the opinion of the Democratic party.

Mr. HUNTER. Do I understand the gentleman as saying that all who were in attendance at that caucus indorsed the compromise?

Mr. POLK. There was no expression of sentiment against it.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. No, not a sentiment was uttered against it; but they voted against it. They voted to lay it on the table. I say, then, that I came to Congress believing there was truth in what we had heard, and with a determination to cut myself loose from all party affiliations; to stand by those who stood by the rights of my section of the Union, and by the Constitution of these States. When I came to the city of Washington yesterday, I learned that a resolution approving of the compromise had been introduced into the Democratic caucus, and, much to my surprise, had been defeated. The Whig party held a meeting to-day, and I confess, somewhat to my surprise, put themselves upon my platform. They stand where I stand; they stand where the great Union party of the South stand; they stand upon the Constitution as it is; they indorse the compromise as a total and final settlement. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] arrived at the conclusion that this action of the Whig caucus was consummated by Southern Whigs, with a few Northern Whigs. I would say to the gentleman, that the distrust among the Southern Whigs was very great in reference to the action of the Northern Whigs. My impression is, that the majority of them did not attend the caucus. There were, I think, but twelve or fourteen of the Southern Whigs in that caucus, all of whom declared their determination to withdraw from the caucus, and no longer to act with the Whig party, if it failed to put itself on this national platform. A majority of those present were Northern Whigs. The Northern Whigs have now placed themselves where I stood last Congress—where the gentlemen from Georgia and myself took our position at an early stage of the organization of the last House of Representatives. We refused to act in concert with men who were pursuing a course that must inevitably lead to the subversion of the institutions of our country. We determined no longer to affiliate with a party that was pursuing such a course.

Mr. MEADE. I would ask the gentleman from Florida if he intends to be deluded by the voices of the twelve or fourteen Northern Whigs who took part in that caucus? For, by his own account, there were fourteen Southern Whigs present, which would leave about twenty-seven Northern Whigs, and as one third of those present refused to vote for the resolution, it leaves but twelve or thirteen Northern Whigs who voted for it.

Mr. CABELL. I will state to the gentleman from Virginia that I was present at that caucus, having determined to act with the Whigs, if they would do what the Democrats failed to do—fully indorse the compromise—and that I have no hesitation in saying that there were not five gentlemen who left the meeting on the passage of the resolution. I think there were but three.

There were, I am pretty sure, between fifty and sixty members present; quite as large a proportionate number as attended the Democratic caucus. I am equally sure there were not more than seven or eight who voted against the resolution. Had the Southern Whigs generally attended the caucus there would have been a much better exhibit. The action of this caucus must be regarded as the action of the Whig party in Congress.

It is certainly a fact, and this must go forth to the country, that a meeting of the Whig members of Congress was called by advertisement, in the papers of this city; that all were invited to attend, and had an opportunity of voting for or against the resolution; and it is to be presumed that if they had had this violent hostility to Southern institutions that is imputed to them, they would have gone into the caucus and done what the Democratic caucus have done—voted down the resolution. At present I am bound to presume that the action of the caucus held this morning is the action of the Whig party, and they have placed themselves upon the platform where I stand.

Mr. MEADE. I would ask the gentleman to state to the House whether he believes that that resolution, even if voted for by the Northern Whigs present, does in fact reflect the opinion of the Whig party of the North?

Mr. CABELL. I will say this, that it reflects the sentiments of the Whig Representatives of the North in this House. I cannot say what are the sentiments of the individual constituents, but it reflects the present sentiments of a majority of the Whig Representatives elected to this House, however unsound the opinions of that portion of the Whig party may have been in former times.

Since I have been in this city and have conversed with members, I have learned—and if I am mistaken I ask gentlemen to correct me—that the Democratic party of the great State of New York have returned to this House but one member (the gentleman from the city of New York, Mr. HART) upon the endorsement of the compromise measures—

Mr. HART. I think the gentleman is in error. Mr. DEAN. As one of the members elected to this House from the State of New York, I would say that the Democratic convention of New York of last year, and the Democratic convention of this year, and the Democratic convention of the Congressional district which I have the honor to represent, indorsed in full the compromise measures as a final settlement of the slavery question.

Mr. CABELL. I did not mean to do the gentleman any injustice, I assure him. What I have said is on the authority of his colleagues. But I may speak of the great Democratic party of his State, whose resolves are before the country. They do not indorse the compromise. I know not what the party of his district may have done; but I have it on good authority that in no district but one was the compromise measures fully indorsed by the nominating convention. The gentleman tells us that the great Democratic party of New York have indorsed the compromise measures. This will astonish the Van Burens and other Barnburners, who compose a majority of that party. Why, who are the members here representing the Democratic party of that State? Who is the honorable gentleman who sits before me, [Mr. PRESTON KING,]—the great head and front of Free-Soilism and Van Burenism in his own party? Who are the great majority of his associates? Were not more than half the men on their State ticket Barnburners? The Hunker Democrats have surrendered, and are in open coalition with the Free-Soilers in the State of New York; and yet the gentleman tells the House that the great Democratic party of the State of New York have indorsed the compromise measures! Go, again, to the State of Ohio—how is it there? How is it in Massachusetts? But it would be inappropriate for me to detain the House at this time by any further reference to this matter.

But the gentleman charges that we, the Whigs of the South, have heretofore acted in concert and coalition with the Abolitionists of the North. He condemns and denounces us for it. But I ask the gentleman, with whom does he find the members of his own party acting in caucus for the purpose of securing certain advantages in the organization of the House? Why, we find them acting in concert with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL,] with the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESTON KING,] whose positions upon this subject are well known. The resolution approving of the compromise was laid on the table, because it was not the time to adopt it; it was not politic to adopt it at this time. It might interfere with their organization, and defeat a Democratic Speaker or Clerk. Thus, the Southern Democrats are doing the very thing that we have been denounced for doing; the very thing that I refused to do in the last Congress. I broke myself loose from my party. And now, the gentlemen opposite are all voting for the gentleman who has been nominated by the Democratic caucus, although no platform has been laid down. They who have been denouncing the Whig party for years past for not laying down their principles openly, now come in here and hope to elect their candidates by the aid of Free-Soilers and Secessionists. We see Union Democrats and Disunion Democrats, Old Hunkers and Barnburners, Free-Soil Democrats and Southern Rights Democrats, everybody of all sorts from the North and from the South, who will come into the Democratic caucus, all acting harmoniously together for the sake of dividing the spoils, but all studiously absolved from expressing their opinions on these important questions.

Mr. MEADE, (interposing.) The call of the caucus was an invitation to all who call themselves Democrats, to attend, just as the call of the Whig caucus was an invitation to all who call themselves Whigs to attend. We could not exclude anybody. We came here for the purpose of making nominations. But will the gentleman pretend to say that there are none of his own party who hold these opinions? Did he attempt to exclude them? Did he attempt to make a nomination independently of those Free-Soilers?

Mr. CABELL. I am so frequently interrupted, that I must of necessity speak disconnectedly. I have but a few words more to say.

It is true that in the Whig caucus, as in the Democratic caucus, there were men of this description, but we did not choose to compromise ourselves for the purpose of securing their votes. We took our position in spite of them, and I thank God for it. Those men left the caucus, and are no longer Whigs. Let them go and follow the example of Senator Chase and other gentlemen from Ohio—act with the great Democratic party. They are no longer Whigs.

For myself, I have only to say, that whatever may be the position of the Whig party, I, for one, stand upon the Constitution of my country, and shall act with the great Union and Constitutional party, be it Whig or Democratic. I shall vote against any man nominated by a coalition caucus. The Whig party could not expect to elect a Whig, and have therefore made no nomination; but having placed ourselves on this constitutional platform, we are willing, and I intend to vote for some good Union compromise Democrat.

Mr. GIDDINGS said: As yet we are not organized. We are acting under no rules. Each member is permitted to speak when he pleases and as long as his judgment dictates. I, however, (said he,) embrace this opportunity of congratulating the honorable Secretary of State and the President upon the beautiful workings of their peace measures—this quieting of all agitation. I will also suggest to gentlemen who appear so eager for the conflict, that we, the free Democracy, intend to afford each of them a legitimate opportunity to express their views on those questions which have now been so inappropriately precipitated upon us. And now I appeal to gentlemen to permit the vote to be taken upon the election of Speaker. I think we owe it to ourselves, to our constituents, and to the country, to proceed to the regular organization of the House. After that, the questions now referred to will come up in legitimate order, at the proper time for discussion.

The House now proceeded to the election of Speaker.

The CLERK announced the following members as tellers to count the vote, viz: Mr. JONES of Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON of Illinois, Mr. BROOKS of New York, and Mr. BOWIE of Maryland.

The roll having been called in alphabetical order, the tellers reported, that the whole number of votes given was 213; necessary to a choice 107; of which—

For Hon. Mr. Bocock—Messrs. Burt, Colcock, Woodward, and Aiken.

For Hon. Mr. Gentry—Messrs. A. Evans, Watkins, and Walsh.

For Hon. Mr. Hillyer—Messrs. A. H. Stephens, and Toombs.

For Hon. Mr. Bowie—J. P. Caldwell.

For Hon. Mr. Outlaw—Mr. Clingman.

For Hon. Mr. Cabell—Mr. Outlaw.

For Hon. Mr. Ashe—Mr. Orr.

For Hon. Mr. Allison—Mr. Thomas M. How.

For Hon. Mr. Meacham—Mr. Thad. Stevens.

For Hon. P. King—Mr. Townsend.

For Hon. G. Jones—Mr. Alex. White.

For Hon. Mr. Gorman—Mr. Thomas H. Bayly.

For Hon. Thos. M. Howe—Mr. Allison.

The Hon. LINN BOYD, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, was declared to be duly elected Speaker.

The CLERK requested Mr. STANLY of North Carolina, and Mr. DISNEY of Ohio, to conduct the Speaker elect to the chair; which duty they performed; thereupon,

The SPEAKER said: Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, for the kindness and confidence shown in selecting me as the Presiding Officer of this body, I beg you to accept my grateful acknowledgments. Properly appreciating the high trust—the responsibility imposed, as well as the high honor conferred by it—I accept the station with a most earnest desire, and a fixed determination to administer its functions, so far as I may be able, in such a manner that our deliberations may be pleasant to ourselves and agreeable and profitable to our common country. [Great applause.]

The CLERK stated that it was customary for the oldest member consecutively of the House to administer the oath of office to the Speaker; and that as Mr. GIDDINGS was the oldest member, he would perform that duty.

Mr. GIDDINGS came forward accordingly, and administered to the Speaker the usual oath to support the Constitution.

MEMBERS QUALIFIED.

The CLERK, according to usage, called the roll, when the members came forward by delegations to the Speaker's chair, and were qualified by the Speaker administering to them the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAYLY. In accordance with our usual custom, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled, and LINN BOYD, one of the Representatives from the State of Kentucky, has been chosen Speaker; and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it not customary to authorize the Clerk to carry that message?

Mr. BAYLY. My resolution provides that the message shall be carried by the Clerk. The law provides that the present Clerk shall continue in office until the appointment of a new Clerk.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BAYLY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Mr. OLDS. Is it not necessary to wait until we are informed of the organization of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the usual custom is for the Senate first to inform the President.

The resolution was then adopted; and Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, Mr. HAVEN, of New York, and Mr. JONES of Tennessee, were appointed the committee.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BAYLY. I move that the rules of the last House be adopted as the rules of this House, until otherwise ordered.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not insist upon that motion. As one of the minority of this House, it is a matter of very little importance to us what rules are adopted. We expect to be governed by the will of the majority, and they must take the responsibility into their own hands; but I appeal to the experience of every member of this House—I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] to say if that majority can accomplish its own purposes by the present rules of this House? I had various consultations with the Speaker of the last House, [Mr. Cobb], and with other individuals, in regard to this subject, who have had much experience in this matter, and I do not hesitate to say, that the rules of this House are made to prevent the transaction of business. A minority can retard the whole business of the House, if they choose.

I hope, therefore, for the sake of the country; I hope, for the sake of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who have business of their own to transact, that they will not adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. If we adopt the rules until further order, there they will stand, and we shall never change them. I desire to see the majority of this House control its business according to their wishes; but I appeal to the experience of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] whether, if these rules be adopted, the majority will be able to accomplish their own object?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I offer the following amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] I move to add to the 102d rule, as follows:

"And that if either of the standing committees shall neglect for thirty days to report on any subject committed to it, a minority of such committee may report thereon whenever such committee shall be called for reports."

Mr. G. I will detain the House but a few moments. I wish to say, that for the last eight years a large portion of the people of these United States have been denied the right of petition. The petitions of the people are referred to the clerks of the standing committees, and there they rest in silence. The voice of the people is smothered, and their constitutional rights are practically denied. The object of this amendment is to insure to the people a respectful answer to their petitions. I need not go into a history of the course which has been pursued in relation to this subject. All of us recollect the efforts of the distinguished and venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) to secure the right of petition to this body; and this rule has been resorted to as an alternative for smothering the voice of petition. It seems to me that if we are, as the majority of this body profess to be, Democrats, the voice of the Democracy of this country, expressed through their petitions, should not only be heard, but should be replied to with respect; that their petitions should either be granted or rejected. The object of this amendment is to insure that result—to provide that the voice of the people shall be heard in this body.

[A message was here received from the Senate, announcing that a quorum of that body had assembled, and were ready to proceed to business.]

Mr. GIDDINGS, (resuming.) It is not my intention to extend my remarks. I wish, however, to say to the new members here, that if we pass over this opportunity for amending our rules, we shall have no other opportunity of effecting that object. It is the only chance. Fourteen years' experience in this House has taught me that this is the only moment when we can lay our hands upon these rules to amend them. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] has alluded to the principle "that the majority shall rule." If the majority are to rule so as to smother the voice of the minority of this House—to prevent petitions from being heard—I, for one, cannot acquiesce in that principle.

Now, for the purpose of testing this question, upon which gentlemen seem so anxious to precipitate their remarks to-day, I offer this amendment, and hope every man will record his vote for or against it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have but one remark to make, and it is this: Of all the difficulties and perplexing questions upon which this House will be called upon to act, they will find none more difficult to settle than the rules which are to govern its deliberations. I have had some little experience upon this subject, and I know that it is with extreme difficulty, when we get into a discussion of this sort, that we can ever close it. The amendment which has just been offered by the gentleman from Ohio is new and unheard-of.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman will permit me to correct him. He will find by examining the Journal of the House four years ago, that the same amendment, couched in the same language, was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) and discussed.

Mr. JONES. I had reference to its adoption as one of the rules for the Government of a legislative body, that the minority of a committee shall have power to report. If it prevail, the minority of a committee—it may be a solitary member representing the minority of a committee—will make the report, and it will be presented here as the report of that committee.

Now, in order to bring the House to the question on the original resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and to get clear of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] I move the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, desired to inquire of the Speaker what would be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER said it would be, if sustained, to bring the House to a direct vote upon the main question.

Mr. STEPHENS asked if it was debatable?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES said that, according to his understanding of parliamentary law, the effect of the previous question was to cut off all amendment and all debate, and to bring the House to a direct vote upon the original resolution.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Tennessee was correct.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GIDDINGS desired the Speaker to explain the effect of the previous question upon his amendment.

The SPEAKER decided that, according to parliamentary law, the question must be taken upon the original resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.]

Mr. MEADE asked if it would be in order to move that the rules of the House be referred to a committee with instructions to amend?

The SPEAKER decided that the motion could not be made under the operation of the previous question.

The question was then taken upon the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] and it was adopted.

Mr. JONES rose to a privileged question. He moved that the vote just taken be reconsidered, and that that motion be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

THE ELECTION OF CLERK.

Mr. HALL moved that the House do now proceed to the election of Clerk.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. JONES of Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON of Illinois, Mr. Brooks of New York, and Mr. Bowie of Maryland, to act as tellers.

The SPEAKER said that nominations were in order, and that no gentleman could be voted for for Clerk unless he was put in nomination before the voting commenced; thereupon,

Mr. SAVAGE nominated JOHN W. FORNEY.

Mr. MEACHAM nominated JAMES C. WALKER.

Mr. CHARLES ALLEN nominated E. J. STANSBURY.

Mr. ALLISON nominated GEORGE DARCY.

Mr. J. W. HOWE nominated HORACE GREELEY, but subsequently withdrew the nomination.

The roll was then called, when the tellers reported, that 208 votes had been given; necessary to a choice 105; of which—

Mr. Forney received.....	129
Mr. Walker.....	72
Mr. Stansbury.....	3
Mr. Darcy.....	2
Mr. R. M. Young.....	2

The following is the vote in detail:

For Mr. Forney—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allen, of Illinois, Andrews, Appleton of Maine, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Bailey of Georgia, Bayly of Virginia, Bockock, Bragg, Breckenridge, Buell, Bushy, Cable of Ohio, Campbell of Illinois, Carter, Caskey, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, Davis of Indiana, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Edgerton, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Freeman, Fuller of Maine, Gangle, Gaylord, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harris of Tennessee, Harris of Alabama, Hart, Hendricks, Heun, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, How of New York, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Johnson of Tennessee, Johnson of Georgia, Johnson of Ohio, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones of New York, Jones of Tennessee, Jones of Pennsylvania, King of New York, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Marshall of California, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullen, McNair, Meade, Millson, Molony, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Olde, Orr, Parker of Pennsylvania, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Powell, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Savage, Scurry, Seymour of New York, Seymour of Connecticut, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Stanton of Tennessee, Stanton of Kentucky, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, Thompson of Virginia, Thurston, Venable, Wilcox, and Wildrick.

For Mr. Walker—Messrs. Appleton of Massachusetts, Barrere, Bell, Bennett, Bibbhaun, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Brown of New Jersey, Burrows, Cabell of Florida, Caldwell, Campbell of Ohio, Chandler, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Davis of Massachusetts, Dockery, Duncan, Evans, Ewing, Fowler, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hornford, John W. For Mr. Stansbury—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Giddings, and Townsend.

For Mr. Darcy—Messrs. Allison, and Thomas M. Howe.

For Mr. Young—Messrs. Colcock and Woodward.

Mr. FORNEY having received a majority of the whole number of votes cast for Clerk, was declared to be duly elected; and he came forward to the Speaker's chair and was qualified by taking the usual oath of office.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. FOWLER offered the following resolution; which was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the daily hour to which this House shall stand adjourned shall be twelve o'clock, until otherwise ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, rose for the purpose of saying, that if no gentleman on the other side of the House objected, he would offer a resolution to save time in regard to the election of Sergeant-at-Arms. It was read as follows:

Resolved, That A. J. Glossbrenner be and he is hereby declared Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-second Congress.

Mr. MACE suggested that the name of Z. W. McKnew be inserted for Doorkeeper, and that of John M. Johnson for Postmaster for the Thirty-second Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution was so modified and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote on the adoption of the resolution, and to lay that motion on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The above officers then presented themselves at the Speaker's table, and were severally sworn in.

SEATS OF MEMBERS.

Mr. HIBBARD offered a resolution; which was read as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House immediately after the passage of this resolution place in a box the name of each member and delegate of the House of Representatives on a separate piece of paper; that he then proceed in presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said pieces of paper; and as each is drawn, he shall announce the name of the member or delegate upon it, who shall then choose his seat for the present session, provided that before said drawing shall commence, the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON, the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. SMART: A bill to regulate the publication of the laws of the United States and the publication of the advertisements.

Also, a bill to prohibit the prosecution of claims against the United States by the heads of Departments, and Senators and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. HALL: A bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way, and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to Saint Joseph, in said State.

By Mr. PHELPS: A bill granting the right of way, and making a grant of land to the State of Missouri in aid of the construction of a railroad from St. Louis to the western line of said State.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 2, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, appeared in his seat this morning.

ORGANIZATION OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The following message from the House of Representatives was delivered by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that LINN BOYD, one of the Representatives from the State of Kentucky, has been chosen Speaker; JOHN W. FORNEY, of Pennsylvania, Clerk; and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

I am also directed to inform the Senate, that the House of Representatives has passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and that Mr. BAYLY of Virginia, Mr. HAVEN of New York, and Mr. JONES of Tennessee, have been appointed the committee on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That a committee of two members be appointed, jointly with the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

On motion of Mr. WHITCOMB, it was Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the President pro tem.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. MILLER the committee.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

On the motion of Mr. ATCHISON, it was Resolved, That the Senate will proceed to the election of a Chaplain to-morrow, at one o'clock.

IRISH PATRIOTS.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I beg to notify the Senate that I shall to-morrow ask leave to introduce a joint resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress with the exiled Irish patriots, Wm. Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates.

The resolution is as follows:

Joint Resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien and Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in consideration of the general sympathy felt by the people of the United States for Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their immediate associates, exiled Irish patriots, and the warm sympathies felt by the countrymen of these distinguished sufferers, who have become adopted citizens of the United States, the President of the United States be requested to authorize a correspondence to be opened with the Government of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, appealing to the magnanimity of the British Government and people in their behalf, and respectfully requesting the liberation of these personages from their present confinement, with an offer to receive them upon the hospitable shores of the United States.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I desire to present the memorial of a convention of 294 delegates from the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri, and the Territory of Minnesota, which assembled at Burlington, in the State of Iowa, on the 23d and 24th days of October, 1851, praying for an appropriation for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river. As the committees are not yet organized, and the memorial is one of a large and most respectable body, I ask that it be laid on the table and printed.

The memorial was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of the present State registers and receivers of the land office at Dubuque, Iowa, asking extra compensation for services in locating military land warrants.

Ordered to lie on the table.

NOTICES.

Mr. ATCHISON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a donation of a portion of the public lands to the State of Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to St. Joseph's, in said State.

Mr. MORTON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way to the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad Company through public lands, and appropriating lands to the State of Florida in aid of the construction of said railroad and branches.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting land to the State of Iowa in aid of the construction of a railroad in said State. It was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CHASE, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in that State. And it was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

SPECIAL ELECTION COMMITTEE.

The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Senate proceeded to ballot for the special committee agreed to be appointed yesterday to consider and report on the Florida contested-election case.

The PRESIDENT announced that the Secretary had furnished him with the following result of the balloting: Mr. BERRIEN had received 21 votes, Mr. BRIGHT 21, Mr. DAVIS 21, Mr. MASON 17, and Mr. PEARCE 12. These five gentlemen having received the highest votes, they were duly elected the special committee.

The remainder of the votes were as follows:

Mr. Douglas.....10	Mr. Norris.....3
Mr. Pratt.....6	Mr. Clarke.....3
Mr. Hamlin.....6	Mr. Shields.....2
Mr. Underwood.....5	Mr. Dodge, of Iowa..2
Mr. Clay.....4	Mr. Sumner.....1
Mr. Cass.....4	Mr. Cooper.....1
Mr. Walker.....4	Mr. Foote, of Miss..1
Mr. Felch.....4	Mr. Foot, of Vt.....1
Mr. Bayard.....4	Mr. Miller.....1
Mr. Geyer.....3	Mr. Jones, of Iowa..1
Mr. Hunter.....3	Mr. Badger.....1
Mr. Atchison.....3	Mr. Whitcomb.....1
Mr. Clemens.....3	Mr. Hale.....1

Mr. BERRIEN. I would inquire what was the whole number of Senators voting?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot tell. It is not usual to require a majority of the whole number to elect members of a select committee. They are elected by a plurality.

Mr. BERRIEN. I was under the impression that it required a majority to constitute any act of the Senate. My impression is, that we have several times balloted repeatedly for members of committees.

The PRESIDENT. The majority rule applies to standing committees.

Mr. BERRIEN. So little desirous am I of the position in which I seem to have been placed, that if the rules of the Senate require a majority to elect, I shall be very glad if those rules be adhered to.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I hope that question will not be urged. The Senate is exceedingly rejoiced at the composition of the committee. I hear on all sides perfect satisfaction expressed.

The PRESIDENT. The rule on the subject, after speaking of the standing committees, says:

"All other committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice."

That settles the question.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that there was a quorum of each of the two Houses in attendance, and that they were ready to receive from him any communication he might be pleased to make, reported, that the committee had discharged the duty intrusted to it, and that the President of the United States informed them that he would immediately communicate with the two Houses in writing.

Soon afterwards, M. P. FILLMORE, Esq., the President's Private Secretary, appeared below the bar, and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

[For the Message, see House proceedings.]

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the President's Message and accompanying documents be printed, and that ten thousand copies thereof, in addition to the usual number, be furnished for the use of the Senate.

RECEPTION AND ENTERTAINMENT OF KOS-SUTH.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution to provide for the reception and entertainment of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, in the United States.

It was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FOOTE. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow this resolution to be considered at this time. The terms of the resolution are exceedingly guarded, and can do no harm any way. Unless it is adopted immediately, I fear it can do no good. The action of the other House will be requisite, and I learn that the distinguished gentleman referred to in the resolution may be expected to arrive in New York this evening. If a joint committee is to be raised at all, it should be raised in time to deliberate on the form of reception. I hope that no obstacle will be thrown in the way of the early passage of the resolution. This measure is not brought forward by me alone; it is the result of much consultation with many persons on both sides of the Chamber. It is introduced, as I said yesterday, somewhat at the instance of the Secretary of State and other members of the Administration, who supposed it important that some resolution should be adopted on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives. In this matter I am the organ of those who, I suppose, entertain the common American feeling in reference to that distinguished stranger. I hope that the resolution will be passed immediately by this body.

The PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked that this resolution may have a second reading at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, gave notice of his intention at a future day to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution declaring the measures of adjustment, so called, a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery.

The resolution is in the following terms:

A resolution declaring the measures of adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it resolved, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to the act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery, and as such, that said measures should be acquiesced in and respected by all good citizens.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 2, 1851.

The House met at 12 o'clock, m.

Mr. GENTRY of Tennessee, and Mr. STONE of Kentucky, appeared to-day, and were qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE objected, as there was an error in the Journal, which should be corrected.

The Journal was then read.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE said that he had voted yesterday in the election for Speaker, but found that his name was not recorded. He had voted for Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. He moved that the Journal be so corrected.

There being no objection, the Journal was corrected accordingly.

Mr. WELCH said that there was an error in recording his vote. He was recorded as having voted for Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. He had voted for Mr. CHANDLER. He hoped the Journal would be so corrected.

There being no objection, the Journal was corrected accordingly.

Mr. DURKEE said that he was recorded on the Journal as having voted for Mr. FORNEY for Clerk. He was not present, and did not vote. He moved that the Journal be so corrected; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWS said that he had been informed by the Clerk that his name was not recorded among the votes for Speaker. He had voted for Mr. STANLY, and hoped the Journal would be corrected in that particular.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

NOTICE OF BILLS.

Mr. COBB said: I desire to give notice of certain bills which I intend to introduce.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know of the Speaker, if the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HIBBARD] does not come up of necessity this morning, as the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. That is the first business in order; but if there be no objection, the gentleman from Alabama can give the notices he desires.

Mr. COBB. I give notice, then, that I shall to-morrow, or on the earliest day practicable, ask leave to introduce a bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands;

A bill to grant the right of way and alternate sections of the public lands to the Selma and Gunter's Landing Railroad in the State of Alabama;

A bill to grant the right of way and alternate sections of the public land to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, in the States of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama;

A bill to grant a quarter section of land to each actual settler upon the public land within the United States; and

A bill to authorize the transfer of land warrants issued under the act of 28th of September, 1850; or, in other words, to require the Secretary of the Interior to give such construction to the law as its makers in the House of Representatives intended, and as said law expresses on its face.

SEATS OF MEMBERS.

The resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. HIBBARD was then read as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House immediately after the passage of this resolution place in a box the name of each member and delegate of the House of Representatives on a separate piece of paper; that he then proceed in presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said pieces of paper; and as each is drawn, he shall announce the name of the member or delegate upon it, who shall then choose his seat for the present session, provided that before said drawing shall commence, the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD,] who introduced the resolution in reference to the selection of seats, that he should so modify it as to make the drawing of seats come off to-morrow, say at half-past twelve o'clock, so that gentlemen who are now absent may have an opportunity of being present to select their seats.

Mr. HIBBARD. So far as I am concerned, I should have no objection to adopt the modification suggested by my friend from Illinois, but it is suggested by other gentlemen around me that the difficulty, which is certainly worthy of being considered, would be obviated if the House would allow other gentlemen to select seats for members who are unavoidably absent.

[Cries of "Agreed!" and "No, no!"]

There are several gentlemen absent by the order of the House, and it would certainly be unfair to proceed with the drawing in their absence.

[A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that that body had concurred in the resolution of the House for the appointment of a committee to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses had assembled, and were ready to receive any communication from him; and that Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. MILLER had been appointed on the part of the Senate.]

Mr. TOOMBS. It seems that there is a good deal of disagreement about this matter. Now, I think that a majority of the House have got better seats than they are likely to get in the lottery, and I therefore move to lay the resolution on the table, so that we may remain as we are. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. RICHARDSON and MEACHAM were appointed.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 34; noes not counted.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say to the House, that Mr. DARBY, of Missouri, is in the city, and has been here since last week, but has been confined to his bed since Monday morning by sickness. I move, therefore, the following as an amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution:

"And inasmuch as Mr. Darby, of Missouri, is confined at his lodgings in this city by reason of sickness, one of his colleagues is authorized to select a seat for him when his name is drawn."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The committee of the Senate appointed to wait on the President is now waiting for us, but the gentlemen who with me are upon the committee of the House, are not willing to be deprived of a choice of seats by absence upon official business, and by order of the House. I hope, therefore, that it will be the pleasure of the House to delay the balloting for seats until half past one o'clock, by which time we shall have returned.

A MEMBER. Some one can choose for you.

Mr. BAYLY. No one can tell what seats we should choose.

Mr. HIBBARD then modified his resolution by striking out the words "immediately after the passage of this resolution," and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "at half past one o'clock this day."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The members of the committee would be perfectly willing to make their choice of seats before they discharge the duties of the committee.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOORE's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It seems to me that it would be much better to postpone the drawing until to-morrow, than to fix it for half-past one o'clock to-day. We may be engaged at that time in hearing the President's message, and I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from New Hampshire, that it would be better to postpone the drawing until to-morrow.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Permit me to make a single suggestion. It is very desirable that the Speaker of the House should have as much opportunity as possible to make up the Committees, and that we should meet as seldom as possible until that is done.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well, then, we can draw for seats after the reading of the President's message to-day. Let the resolution be modified in that way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest, that if the Executive message is being read when the hour of half-past one arrives, the drawing of seats will come up as the next business.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that arrangement, and I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out the words, "at half-past one o'clock," and inserting, "immediately after the reading of the Executive message this day."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was adopted.

SEATS FOR REPORTERS.

Mr. RICHARDSON proposed the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of this House be authorized to provide seats for the Reporters of the full debates and proceedings, in front of the Clerk's table, if it can be done without incommoding the House.

Mr. R. said: I desire to say only one word in relation to this resolution. There is no gentleman, I apprehend, who has served here for two sessions, but has often been misreported. He has been made to say exactly those things in the report which he did not say in the House, and it often puts us to a great deal of trouble and inconvenience. It is very important, if we are to be reported at all, that we should be reported correctly; but that cannot be done unless we can adopt some means by which the reporters shall be situated in a better position for hearing than they now occupy. I think it very desirable that this should be done, and therefore I offer this resolution.

Mr. EVANS. I desire only to add a few words to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, and to express my entire assent to his resolution. Experience has demonstrated the necessity of it. No person has ever spoken in this House who has been fully heard by the reporters at those desks. Unless we provide seats for the reporters within the bar—as gentlemen will remember is done in the Senate—gentlemen cannot be better reported than they have been heretofore. It can occasion no inconvenience to the House, but will be a great benefit to us. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. KING, of New York. It seems to me that the Hall should be arranged for the accommodation of members, and there is evidently not space enough in the centre of the Hall when we are occupied in taking a count by tellers, for seats for the reporters. A resolution of this kind was passed during the last Congress, and after efforts had been made to provide seats in the manner proposed, it was found to be impossible, and the resolution was reconsidered. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. CARTTER. I would merely suggest, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KING,] that on each side of the Speaker's chair, in the adoption of the resolution, and out of the range of the tellers, there are spaces that might be occupied by the reporters, without at all incommoding the members of the House. By providing seats for the reporters in those spaces, we might afford them a better opportunity for hearing than they now enjoy.

Mr. KING. If seats can be provided elsewhere than in front of the Clerk's desk without interfering with the House, I have no objection to it; but the resolution provides that they shall be placed in front of the desk.

Mr. CARTTER. To obviate that objection, I move to strike out the words "in front of the Clerk's desk," and insert "within the Hall."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will accept that amendment. I desire only to attain the end which the gentleman from Ohio has in view.

Mr. HOUSTON. It occurs to me that that resolution is entirely too indefinite. In the first place, it authorizes the Doorkeeper to make a very material change in the construction of the Hall, and to cause an obstruction of the area around the Clerk's desk. There seems to be no restriction at all—no limit to control the Doorkeeper.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe there are only two reporters engaged in reporting the debates fully, and it is for those two only that provision is to be made. I am willing that the resolution shall be limited to providing seats for those two.

Mr. HOUSTON. It seems to me that there are other objections to the resolution. If we propose to make a change in the construction of our Hall, and especially if we attempt to make an encroachment upon our area, that is already, in my view, small enough, it seems to me that a committee of this House ought to examine into the manner in which it can be done. I do not think we ought to authorize the Doorkeeper to provide these seats without directing the manner in which he shall do it, and saying where the seats shall be, of what construction they shall be, and what number of them there shall be. It does seem to me that we ought not to adopt the resolution in its present indefinite form, but that we ought to place some sort of restriction upon the action of the Doorkeeper. In its present form, I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will modify my resolution to provide for two seats only. It is quite unnecessary, in my opinion, that a committee should be raised for this purpose. If the improvement is made at all, it will be made under the supervision of the Presiding Officer; and I have entire confidence that he will do nothing that would incommode the members of the House. The resolution provides that if, in his opinion, it will incommode the members, the arrangement shall not be made.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Illinois, I understand, replies to my suggestion by saying, that if the change is made at all, it will be made under the direction of the Presiding Officer. Now, as I understand the terms of that resolution—I may be mistaken—it takes it out of the hands of the Speaker, and leaves it entirely to the discretion of the Doorkeeper, to make the arrangement according to his views; it leaves the matter to him, and to him alone. That is my understanding of the resolution.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I concur fully in the views and objects of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.] It strikes me that the gentleman ought to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] I think we had better throw the responsibility upon a committee of this House. The Doorkeeper is a mere officer of this House, and I care not how he decides the question, he will by a portion of the members, probably, be censured for his decision. I prefer to let the committee of the House be appointed to report the facts of the case to the House. If it is ascertained that we can furnish seats for the reporters in the House, let it be done, but throw the responsibility where it ought to be, upon the members of the House. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] will accept the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] If he does not, I desire that we shall take a vote upon it, and throw the responsibility, where it should rest, upon ourselves.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved the previous question; which was seconded.

Mr. RICHARDSON called for tellers on the adoption of the resolution; and they were ordered; and Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. HOUSTON were appointed.

The question then being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 72.

So the resolution was rejected.

NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. ROBBINS presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk cause to be furnished to the members of this House, during the present session, such papers as they may respectively direct, the expense thereof not to exceed the rate of $30 per annum to each member, from the commencement of the session.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "thirty," and inserting in its stead the word "fifty." Thirty dollars enables us to receive but three daily papers. There is more than that number published in this city which it is useful for members to take. We desire to take papers from abroad, and thirty dollars is too small to supply us.

Mr. FOWLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by substituting "forty" for "fifty."

The SPEAKER. The question will be put upon the largest number first.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not the amendment amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the question will first be taken upon the largest number proposed.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out $30 and insert $50, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. EVANS. I wish to call the attention of the House to what they have, perhaps, not considered with respect to the taking of these newspapers. Members are charged $10 for a daily paper, and are therefore entitled to receive it for a whole year, yet they only receive it until the end of the session, and thus the $30 is speedily exhausted. Now, last session the Senate, on account of this very difficulty, adopted a resolution by which every Senator receives his papers during the whole year. That is now the rule of the Senate. The members of the House of Representatives are entitled to the same privileges as Senators are; and I therefore move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "during the present session," and inserting in lieu thereof, "for one year."

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, accepted the amendment.

Mr. SWEETSER. I would suggest, that it would meet the views of all parties if the words "during the Thirty-second Congress" were inserted instead of "for one year."

Mr. BOWIE. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to make remarks in opposition to the amendment as amended.

The SPEAKER said that it was.

Mr. BOWIE. I regret very much to differ from my colleague and the honorable gentleman who has offered the resolution. I really think the time has come to raise the voice of this House in behalf of economy. I have no disposition to carp at small things, but when example after example of extravagance has been exhibited by the last Congress, I think at the threshold of this is the proper opportunity to set our face against it. There is an old adage to this effect: Economy is a good thing—good in the subject, better in the King. Economy is, if commendable in the citizen, infinitely more commendable in the representative of the people. Gentlemen who have a knowledge of what passed in the last Congress, know that we voted for ourselves from $50,000 to $100,000 worth of books, and that done only in accordance to precedent. Now, we are again proposing to give ourselves personal donations; for this resolution does nothing more nor less than contribute to our personal benefit. No one can contend that any member of this House requires five daily papers in order to enlighten him as to his duty to his country. Our time, if properly devoted, is absorbed by perusing the documents having an immediate connection with our duties as Representatives. We have not time to gather news from the four quarters. For what purpose is it we are now proposing to increase, in this single item the expenditure, of this House to the amount of $4,000? I hope gentlemen will consider the end proposed by the resolution, and look upon it as the shadow of what is to come. If we commence in small things, we shall continue to increase in every item of expenditure in the same ratio, until the contingent expenses of this House must receive the rebuke of our constituents. There are many members around me infinitely better acquainted with the dozen sources of expenditure than myself, and which are multiplying every day, and I hope some one of them will raise his voice in opposition to this decided indication of a disposition to waste the people's money.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly gratified to hear the remarks made by the gentleman upon the other side of the Chamber, and I trust they will be responded to by all the gentlemen upon the other side. I suppose, sir, the Democratic party, and I hope the Representatives in Congress, are determined to make war upon the extravagance of the Government. I think it would place us in rather a queer position, in doing our duty with respect to the extravagance of this Government, to commence increasing our own expenditures, and most unnecessarily, as I think, too. I have been here two Congresses, and I must confess, so far as I am concerned, the number of papers furnished under the old resolution were as many as I had a need for. I could not use any more with any profit, and I do not believe any gentleman could use any more with any profit. If it, therefore, be in order, I will move, in substitution for that resolution, the resolution of the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. BOWIE. Whenever it is in order, I will move to substitute it for that resolution. It is, I believe, sufficient for the members of the House.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, said: I desire to express, with my honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] my gratitude for the noble and manly expression of sentiments favorable to economy, which I have just heard from the other side of the Hall. It is to me, sir, an indication of a returning sense of reason upon the part of my Whig friends, and I am happy to have heard it here to-day from one of the leading and influential men of that party, [Mr. BOWIE,] a gentleman whom I esteem highly, and who, having thrown himself into the breach, will battle manfully for the principles of economy which he has just inculcated.

I feel assured, sir, that his economy is not of that two-penny, picayune order which has so often been exhibited in this House, and that when we come to make appropriations for the support of the Navy, hitherto so extravagant—when we come to make appropriations for the Army, heretofore so imprudent and wasteful—when we come to appropriate the vast sums annually appropriated to carry on the machinery of this great Government, his voice will be heard ringing clear and loud in favor of retrenchment and economy. I do not understand the wisdom of that system of economy which “saves at the spigot and lets out at the bung-hole”—the economy which would scruple at a useful expenditure of a few dollars, and permit millions to pass without discussion, and sometimes without even investigation. Look at the enormous expenditures of the last two years! Did our Whig friends then scruple to vote for the recommendations of their Secretary? On the contrary, they marched up in solid phalanx in support of them. This appropriation is a small matter, and it is vehemently resisted. I trust the same zeal will manifest itself in behalf of economy when larger matters shall come before us.

The resolution proposes to expend fifty dollars to supply the members with newspapers. If it were an hundred it would be profitably and usefully expended. The sum itself is scarcely enough to pay for the daily papers of this city, which are needed and used by each member, and we ought not to be confined to this city. We need the commercial and political intelligence derived from distant papers, to enable us to legislate wisely in regard to the interests of this great people. I confess, for one, sir, that I need the intelligence on the subject of commerce, politics, and other matters which other countries, and other portions of our own country, furnish, to enable me to act intelligently and wisely upon many subjects which will come up for consideration in this House. Unlike my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] I am not ashamed to own that I need light, and that I will be benefited by the intelligence which newspapers will afford. The appropriation will be useful to me, to my constituents, and the country; and I trust the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I would not have troubled the House further, had it not been for what has fallen from my colleague, [Mr. BOWIE.] I have not offered anything extravagant. I do not care if you do not take any papers at all. I am willing to supply my own. You may cut off the per diem—I will stand that. Take it all away, and the mileage along with it.

[Cries of “Oh! no!” and laughter.]

Mr. EVANS. It does not make any difference with me. It is well known by those who have served in the House with me that I have been as economical as other gentlemen. I do not know how the gentleman voted upon a certain private claim of $150,000. I know well enough I voted against it. I have proposed to myself always a sound economy; but I wish, if you pass this resolution subscribing for newspapers, that you shall make it efficient to yourselves. After you amend the resolution in that way, you may vote it down, if you like. I am quite as ready as the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. BOWIE,] or any other gentleman, to subscribe for all my own papers.

Mr. CARTTER. If the object of this proposition is based upon the necessity of increasing the intelligence of this House, there is no doubt that all need it; but the curiosity about the matter is the source from which we are to draw this intelligence. What is to be the effect of this proposition? It is a subscription to the newspaper press of the country—a newspaper press fed by the proceedings of this body! And you propose to give $50 to the newspaper press of this country to secure this political intelligence, founded on the news you furnish yourselves. This is the kind of intelligence you propose to acquire. [Laughter.] I apprehend this is a mere “scape-goat,” to get news to improve the heart. I think if you will go into the Senate chamber and ascertain what kind of food they feed their intellects upon, you will find Godey's Lady's Book and Graham's Magazine, and the other literary periodicals of the day, franked to their wives and daughters and sweethearts. [Laughter.] This, I apprehend, is the cause of this great desire to acquire intelligence. This will be the result of it. It is all a humbug!

Mr. BAYLY (interrupting) announced, that the committee upon the part of the House to wait upon the President of the United States and to inform him that we were organized and ready to receive any communication from him, had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them that he would make a communication in writing immediately.

Mr. CARTTER continued. I would not object to this acquirement of intelligence with a view of discharging political duties; I would not object to the appropriation, if it could be legitimately expended for that end; but if this appropriation be made to the extent recommended by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] it will but bring back to this body the senseless scribbling of a set of hired reporters within this Hall, the chief part of whose employment is to draw the portraiture of the members for pay. This is the kind of political intelligence you will get; or the record of the proceedings of some meeting, got up to order—a beef steak convention in the city of New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, to feed some candidate into the Presidency. These things are manufactured to order, and multiply just as often as funds are furnished to purchase the steak with. [A laugh.] Now, I do not feel the want of any such intelligence; I would rather rely upon my instincts, as the safest guides under the Constitution, than upon intelligence of this kind. [Great laughter.] But this species of news does not come from the West; it does not come from the interior of the Union; it is fulminated to order in the corrupt cities of the East, where the hired minions of political ambition bring their brains into operation, in order to reach public opinion in the interior. Now, I am not in favor of pandering to any such corruption. I have no candidate of my own for the Presidency who needs any such kind of fodder, [a laugh,] and I shall therefore be under the necessity of voting against this resolution, although I feel the want of intelligence as much as any one.

Mr. CLARK. It is contended that the mere amount of the appropriation contemplated in this resolution is one of minor importance, and perhaps it is so; but the principles involved, which form a part and parcel of a system of extravagant expenditures I regard as worthy of our consideration. I know that there are those who regard economy in matters of this kind, rather with contempt. This may be allowed, so long as gentlemen are confined to the use of their own money; but when they are about to appropriate the money of others, I think they should view the matter differently. We are here about to appropriate the people's money, and in doing so, we ought to have reference, not only to our rights, which we may properly exercise, but also to the feelings and wishes of the people whose money we are to appropriate. I trust we shall not transcend the rights with which we are clothed in this matter; I trust we shall do nothing which will prejudice the feelings of the people against us. A less amount will be sufficient—abundantly sufficient to supply all our wants. I hope that an appropriation for a smaller amount will prevail. I shall certainly vote for it.

Mr. SKELTON. It is with some degree of reluctance that I have risen to address a few remarks to the House; but after the remarks just made upon this floor, I deem it due, not only to myself, but to the country, that I should take decided ground in relation to this measure, not so much in consequence of the amount involved in the resolution—as the gentleman on my right [Mr. CLARK] has justly observed—as in consequence of the principle involved in the question now presented for our consideration. Now, I am here as an individual, to represent honestly my constituents. In doing so, I pledge myself, upon all occasions, to vote for the strictest economy in the administration of the finances of our common country. In conformity with that pledge, in order to be consistent, I do not desire to commence with appropriations to myself. I shall vote against receiving anything in the shape of presents from this House. I am unwilling to vote even for the small appropriations provided for in the resolution now under consideration, not because I am not ready to receive instruction from the enlightened press of our country; I have always made provision for receiving such instruction, and I have already provided for myself during the present session. I have subscribed for every weekly newspaper in my district; I have subscribed for three daily papers, and I am perfectly willing to pay for them out of my per diem allowance.

Now, I trust we may be consistent with ourselves; I hope we may enter upon the discharge of our duties as representatives in this Hall, by advocating economy in the expenditures of the Government; and in carrying out this principle we should begin with ourselves. Let it not be said when we return to our homes, that we have economically administered the affairs of our country in all matters relating to others, but have departed from the principle in regard to ourselves. I wish to be consistent; and in order to be so, I desire to say to my constituents, and to the country, once for all, that I shall vote, on all occasions, against all appropriations as presents to myself; and I shall likewise vote for the most rigid economy in administering the affairs of the Government. I hope we shall reject the resolution.

Mr. HALL asked if it would now be in order to move a substitute for the resolution? He desired to present precisely a copy of the resolution adopted for several Congresses past.

The SPEAKER said it would be in order.

Mr. HALL. I then offer the following as a substitute for the whole resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk cause to be furnished to the members of this House, during the present session, such papers as they may direct, the expense thereof not to exceed the price of three daily papers to each member, from the commencement of the session.

Mr. CAMPBELL said that the time consumed in the discussion would almost pay for the papers; he therefore moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

The question was put, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. CAMPBELL then moved the previous question.

Mr. FICKLIN inquired what would be the effect of the previous question if sustained?

The SPEAKER said, it would be to bring the House to a direct vote first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] then upon the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri, and then upon the original resolution.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLARK demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] and it was adopted—yeas 112, noes not counted.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. HALL demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, Andrews, Ashe, Averet, T. H. Bayly, Bell, Bibbians, Biscoe, Bowie, Buell, Busby, Caldwell, Carter, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Colcock, Daniel, Dawson, Dockery, Duncan, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Gentry, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, A. H. Stephens, Stratton, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benj. B. Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Venable, Walsh, Ward, and Williams—98.

So the substitute was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution, as amended.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

A message was then received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his Private Secretary, MILLARD P. FILLMORE; which was read by Mr. FORNEY, Clerk of the House, as follows:
Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I congratulate you and our common constituency upon the favorable auspices under which you meet for your first session. Our country is at peace with all the world. The agitation which, for a time, threatened to disturb the fraternal relations which make us one people, is fast subsiding; and a year of general prosperity and health has crowned the nation with unusual blessings. None can look back to the dangers which are passed, or forward to the bright prospect before us, without feeling a thrill of gratification, at the same time that he must be impressed with a grateful sense of our profound obligations to a beneficent Providence, whose paternal care is so manifest in the happiness of this highly-favored land.

Since the close of the last Congress, certain Cubans and other foreigners resident in the United States, who were more or less concerned in the previous invasion of Cuba, instead of being discouraged by its failure, have again abused the hospitality of this country by making it the scene of the equipment of another military expedition against that possession of her Catholic Majesty, in which they were countenanced, aided, and joined by citizens of the United States. On receiving intelligence that such designs were entertained, I lost no time in issuing such instructions to the proper officers of the United States as seemed to be called for by the occasion. By the proclamation, a copy of which is herewith submitted, I also warned those who might be in danger of being inveigled into this scheme of its unlawful character, and of the penalties which they would incur. For some time there was reason to hope that these measures had sufficed to prevent any such attempt. This hope, however, proved to be delusive. Very early in the morning of the third of August, a steamer called the Pampero departed from New Orleans for Cuba, having on board upwards of four hundred armed men, with evident intentions to make war upon the authorities of the Island. This expedition was set on foot in palpable violation of the laws of the United States. Its leader was a Spaniard, and several of the chief officers, and some others engaged in it, were foreigners. The persons composing it, however, were mostly citizens of the United States.

Before the expedition set out, and probably before it was organized, a slight insurrectionary movement, which appears to have been soon suppressed, had taken place in the eastern quarter of Cuba. The importance of this movement was unfortunately so much exaggerated in the accounts of it published in this country, that these adventurers seem to have been led to believe that the Creole population of the Island not only desired to throw off the authority of the mother country, but had resolved upon that step, and had begun a well-concerted enterprise for effecting it. The persons engaged in the expedition were generally young and ill-informed. The steamer in which they embarked left New Orleans stealthily and without a clearance. After touching at Key West, she proceeded to the coast of Cuba, and, on the night between the 11th and 12th of August, landed the persons on board at Playtas, within about twenty leagues of Havana.

The main body of them proceeded to, and took possession of, an inland village six leagues distant, leaving others to follow in charge of the baggage, as soon as the means of transportation could be obtained. The latter, having taken up their line of march to connect themselves with the main body, and having proceeded about four leagues into the country, were attacked on the morning of the 13th by a body of Spanish troops, and a bloody conflict ensued; after which they retreated to the place of disembarkation, where about fifty of them obtained boats and reembarked therein. They were, however, intercepted among the keys near the shore by a Spanish steamer cruising on the coast, captured, and carried to Havana, and, after being examined before a military court, were sentenced to be publicly executed, and the sentence was carried into effect on the 16th of August.

On receiving information of what had occurred, Commodore Foxhall A. Parker was instructed to proceed in the steam frigate Saranac to Havana, and inquire into the charges against the persons executed, the circumstances under which they were taken, and whatsoever referred to their trial and sentence. Copies of the instructions from the Department of State to him, and of his letters to that Department, are herewith submitted.

According to the record of the examination, the prisoners all admitted the offences charged against them, of being hostile invaders of the Island. At the time of their trial and execution the main body of the invaders were still in the field, making war upon the Spanish authorities and Spanish subjects. After the lapse of some days, being overcome by the Spanish troops, they dispersed on the 24th of August; Lopez, their leader, was captured some days after, and executed on the 1st of September. Many of his remaining followers were killed, or died of hunger and fatigue, and the rest were made prisoners. Of these, none appear to have been tried or executed. Several of them were pardoned upon application of their friends and others, and the rest, about one hundred and sixty in number, were sent to Spain. Of the final disposition made of these we have no official information.

Such is the melancholy result of this illegal and ill-fated expedition. Thus, thoughtless young men have been induced, by false and fraudulent representations, to violate the law of their country, through rash and unfounded expectations of assisting to accomplish political revolutions in other States, and have lost their lives in the undertaking. Too severe a judgment can hardly be passed, by the indignant sense of the community, upon those who, being better informed themselves, have yet led away the ardor of youth and an ill-directed love of political liberty. The correspondence between this Government and that of Spain relating to this transaction is herewith communicated.

Although these offenders against the laws have forfeited the protection of their country, yet the Government may, so far as is consistent with its obligations to other countries, and its fixed purpose to maintain and enforce the laws, entertain sympathy for their unoffending families and friends, as well as a feeling of compassion for themselves. Accordingly no proper effort has been spared, and none will be spared, to procure the release of such citizens of the United States, engaged in this unlawful enterprise, as are now in confinement in Spain; but it is to be hoped that such interposition with the Government of that country may not be considered as affording any ground of expectation that the Government of the United States will, hereafter, feel itself under any obligation of duty to interfere for the liberation or pardon of such persons as are flagrant offenders against the law of nations and the laws of the United States. Those laws must be executed. If we desire to maintain our respectability among the nations of the earth, it behooves us to enforce steadily and sternly the Neutrality acts passed by Congress, and to follow, as far as may be, the violation of those acts with condign punishment.

But what gives a peculiar criminality to this invasion of Cuba is, that, under the lead of Spanish subjects and with the aid of citizens of the United States, it had its origin, with many, in motives of cupidity. Money was advanced by individuals, probably in considerable amounts, to purchase Cuban bonds, as they have been called, issued by Lopez, sold, doubtless, at a very large discount, and for the payment of which the public lands and public property of Cuba, of whatever kind, and the fiscal resources of the people and government of that Island, from whatever source to be derived, were pledged, as well as the good faith of the government expected to be established. All these means of payment, it is evident, were only to be obtained by a process of bloodshed, war, and revolution. None will deny that those who set on foot military expeditions against foreign States by means like these, are far more culpable than the ignorant and the necessitous whom they induce to go forth as the ostensible parties in the proceeding. These originators of the invasion of Cuba seem to have determined, with coolness and system, upon an undertaking which should disgrace their country, violate its laws, and put to hazard the lives of ill-informed and deluded men. You will consider whether further legislation be necessary to prevent the perpetration of such offences in future.

No individuals have the right to hazard the peace of the country, or to violate its laws, upon vague notions of altering or reforming governments in other States. This principle is not only reasonable in itself, and in accordance with public law, but is ingrafted into the codes of other nations, as well as our own. But while such are the sentiments of this Government, it may be added that every independent nation must be presumed to be able to defend its possessions against unauthorized individuals banded together to attack them. The Government of the United States, at all times since its establishment, has abstained, and has sought to restrain the citizens of the country, from entering into controversies between other Powers, and to observe all the duties of neutrality. At an early period of the Government—in the administration of Washington—several laws were passed for this purpose. The main provisions of these laws were reenacted by the act of April, 1818, by which, amongst other things, it was declared, that if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin, or set on foot, or provide, or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years; and this law has been executed and enforced, to the full extent of the power of the Government, from that day to this.

In proclaiming and adhering to the doctrine of neutrality and non-intervention, the United States have not followed the lead of other civilized nations; they have taken the lead themselves, and have been followed by others. This was admitted by one of the most eminent of modern British statesmen, who said in Parliament, while a minister of the Crown, "that if he wished for a 'guide in a system of neutrality, he should take 'that laid down by America in the days of Washington and the Secretaryship of Jefferson,'" and we see, in fact, that the act of Congress of 1818 was followed the succeeding year by an act of the Parliament of England, substantially the same in its general provisions. Up to that time there had been no similar law in England, except certain highly penal statutes passed in the reign of George II., prohibiting English subjects from enlisting in foreign service, the avowed object of which statutes was, that foreign armies, raised for the purpose of restoring the house of Stuart to the throne, should not be strengthened by recruits from England herself.

All must see that difficulties may arise in carrying the laws referred to into execution in a country now having three or four thousand miles of sea-coast, with an infinite number of ports and harbors and small inlets, from some of which unlawful expeditions may suddenly set forth, without the knowledge of Government, against the possessions of foreign States.

Friendly relations with all, but entangling alliances with none, has long been a maxim with us. Our true mission is not to propagate our opinions, or impose upon other countries our form of government, by artifice or force; but to teach by example, and show by our success, moderation, and justice, the blessings of self-government and the advantages of free institutions. Let every people choose for itself, and make and alter its political institutions to suit its own condition and convenience. But, while we avow and maintain this neutral policy ourselves, we are anxious to see the same forbearance on the part of other nations, whose forms of government are different from our own. The deep interest which we feel in the spread of liberal principles and the establishment of free governments, and the sympathy with which we witness every struggle against oppression, forbid that we should be indifferent to those in which the strong arm of a foreign power is invoked to stifle public sentiment, and repress the spirit of freedom in any country.

The Governments of Great Britain and France have issued orders to their naval commanders on the West India station to prevent by force, if necessary, the landing of adventurers from any nation on the Island of Cuba with hostile intent. The copy of a memorandum of a conversation on this subject between the Chargé d'Affaires of her Britannic Majesty and the Acting Secretary of State, and of a subsequent note of the former to the Department of State, are herewith submitted, together with a copy of a note of the Acting Secretary of State to the Minister of the French Republic, and of the reply of the latter, on the same subject. These papers will acquaint you with the grounds of this interposition of the two leading commercial Powers of Europe, and with the apprehensions, which this Government could not fail to entertain, that such interposition, if carried into effect, might lead to abuses in derogation of the maritime rights of the United States. The maritime rights of the United States are founded on a firm, secure, and well-defined basis; they stand upon the ground of national independence and public law, and will be maintained in all their full and just extent.

The principle which this Government has heretofore solemnly announced it still adheres to, and will maintain under all circumstances and at all hazards. That principle is, that in every regularly documented merchant vessel, the crew who navigate it, and those on board of it, will find their protection in the flag which is over them. No American ship can be allowed to be visited or searched for the purpose of ascertaining the character of individuals on board, nor can there be allowed any watch by the vessels of any foreign nation over American vessels on the coasts of the United States, or the seas adjacent thereto. It will be seen by the last communication from the British Chargé d'Affaires to the Department of State, that he is authorized to assure the Secretary of State that every care will be taken that, in executing the preventive measures against the expeditions, which the United States Government itself has denounced as not being entitled to the protection of any Government, no interference shall take place with the lawful commerce of any nation.

In addition to the correspondence on this subject, herewith submitted, official information has been received at the Department of State, of assurances by the French Government that, in the orders given to the French naval forces, they were expressly instructed, in any operations they might engage in, to respect the flag of the United States, wherever it might appear, and to commit no act of hostility upon any vessel or armament under its protection.

Ministers and consuls of foreign nations are the means and agents of communication between us and those nations, and it is of the utmost importance that, while residing in the country, they should feel a perfect security so long as they faithfully discharge their respective duties, and are guilty of no violation of our laws. This is the admitted law of nations, and no country has a deeper interest in maintaining it than the United States. Our commerce spreads over every sea, and visits every clime, and our ministers and consuls are appointed to protect the interests of that commerce, as well as to guard the peace of the country, and maintain the honor of its flag. But how can they discharge these duties unless they be themselves protected? and, if protected, it must be by the laws of the country in which they reside. And what is due to our own public functionaries residing in foreign nations is exactly the measure of what is due to the functionaries of other Governments residing here. As in war, the bearers of flags of truce are sacred, or else wars would be interminable, so in peace, ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls, charged with friendly national intercourse, are objects of especial respect and protection, each according to the rights belonging to his rank and station. In view of these important principles, it is with deep mortification and regret I announce to you that, during the excitement growing out of the executions at Havana, the office of her Catholic Majesty's consul at New Orleans was assailed by a mob, his property destroyed, the Spanish flag found in the office carried off and torn in pieces, and he himself induced to flee for his personal safety, which he supposed to be in danger. On receiving intelligence of these events, I forthwith directed the attorney of the United States, residing at New Orleans, to inquire into the facts, and the extent of the pecuniary loss sustained by the consul, with the intention of laying them before you, that you might make provision for such indemnity to him as a just regard for the honor of the nation and the respect which is due to a friendly power, might, in your judgment, seem to require. The correspondence upon this subject between the Secretary of State and her Catholic Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary is herewith transmitted.

The occurrence at New Orleans has led me to give my attention to the state of our laws in regard to foreign ambassadors, ministers, and consuls. I think the legislation of the country is deficient in not providing sufficiently either for the protection or the punishment of consuls. I therefore recommend the subject to the consideration of Congress.

Your attention is again invited to the question of reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, and other British possessions near our frontier. Overtures for a convention upon this subject have been received from her Britannic Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary, but it seems to be in many respects preferable that the matter should be regulated by reciprocal legislation. Documents are laid before you, showing the terms which the British Government is willing to offer, and the measures which it may adopt, if some arrangement upon this subject shall not be made.

From the accompanying copy of a note from the British legation at Washington, and the reply of the Department of State thereto, it will appear that her Britannic Majesty's Government is desirous that a part of the boundary line between Oregon and the British possessions should be authoritatively marked out, and that an intention was expressed to apply to Congress for an appropriation to defray the expense thereof on the part of the United States. Your attention to this subject is accordingly invited, and a proper appropriation recommended.

A convention for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States against Portugal has been concluded, and the ratifications have been exchanged. The first installment of the amount to be paid by Portugal fell due on the 30th of September last, and has been paid.

The President of the French Republic, according to the provisions of the convention, has been selected as arbiter in the case of the General Armstrong, and has signified that he accepts the trust, and the high satisfaction he feels in acting as the common friend of two nations with which France is united by sentiments of sincere and lasting amity.

The Turkish Government has expressed its thanks for the kind reception given to the Sultan's agent, Amin Bey, on the occasion of his recent visit to the United States. On the 28th of February last, a dispatch was addressed by the Secretary of State to Mr. Marsh, the American Minister at Constantinople, instructing him to ask of the Turkish Government permission for the Hungarians, then imprisoned within the dominions of the Sublime Porte, to remove to this country. On the 3d of March last, both Houses of Congress passed a resolution requesting the President to authorize the employment of a public vessel to convey to this country Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity.

The instruction above referred to was complied with, and the Turkish Government having released Governor Kossuth and his companions from prison, on the 10th of September last they embarked on board of the United States steam-frigate Mississippi, which was selected to carry into effect the resolution of Congress. Governor Kossuth left the Mississippi at Gibraltar, for the purpose of making a visit to England, and may shortly be expected in New York. By communications to the Department of State he has expressed his grateful acknowledgments for the interposition of this Government in behalf of himself and his associates. This country has been justly regarded as a safe asylum for those whom political events have exiled from their own homes in Europe; and it is recommended to Congress to consider in what manner Governor Kossuth and his companions, brought hither by its authority, shall be received and treated.

It is earnestly to be hoped that the differences which have for some time past been pending between the Government of the French Republic and that of the Sandwich Islands, may be peaceably and durably adjusted, so as to secure the independence of those Islands. Long before the events which have of late imparted so much importance to the possessions of the United States on the Pacific, we acknowledged the independence of the Hawaiian Government. This Government was first in taking that step, and several of the leading Powers of Europe immediately followed. We were influenced in this measure by the existing and prospective importance of the Islands as a place of refuge and refreshment for our vessels engaged in the whale fishery, and by the consideration that they lie in the course of the great trade which must, at no distant day, be carried on between the western coast of North America and Eastern Asia.

We were also influenced by a desire that those Islands should not pass under the control of any other great maritime State, but should remain in an independent condition, and so be accessible and useful to the commerce of all nations. I need not say that the importance of these considerations has been greatly enhanced by the sudden and vast development which the interests of the United States have attained in California and Oregon; and the policy heretofore adopted in regard to those Islands will be steadily pursued.

It is gratifying, not only to those who consider the commercial interests of nations, but also to all who favor the progress of knowledge and the diffusion of religion, to see a community emerge from a savage state and attain such a degree of civilization in those distant seas.

It is much to be deplored that the internal tranquillity of the Mexican Republic should again be seriously disturbed; for, since the peace between that Republic and the United States, it had enjoyed such comparative repose that the most favorable anticipations for the future might, with a degree of confidence, have been indulged. These, however, have been thwarted by the recent outbreak in the State of Tamaulipas, on the right bank of the Rio Bravo. Having received information that persons from the United States had taken part in the insurrection, and apprehending that their example might be followed by others, I caused orders to be issued for the purpose of preventing any hostile expeditions against Mexico from being set on foot in violation of the laws of the United States. I likewise issued a proclamation upon the subject, a copy of which is herewith laid before you. This appeared to be rendered imperative by the obligations of treaties and the general duties of good neighborhood.

In my last annual message I informed Congress that citizens of the United States had undertaken the connection of the two oceans by means of a railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, under a grant of the Mexican Government to a citizen of that Republic; and that this enterprise would probably be prosecuted with energy whenever Mexico should consent to such stipulations with the Government of the United States as should impart a feeling of security to those who should invest their property in the enterprise.

A convention between the two Governments for the accomplishment of that end has been ratified by this Government, and only awaits the decision of the Congress and the Executive of that Republic.

Some unexpected difficulties and delays have arisen in the ratification of that convention by Mexico, but it is to be presumed that her decision will be governed by just and enlightened views, as well of the general importance of the object, as of her own interests and obligations.

In negotiating upon this important subject, this Government has had in view one, and only one, object. That object has been, and is, the construction or attainment of a passage from ocean to ocean, the shortest and the best for travelers and merchandise, and equally open to all the world. It has sought to attain no territorial acquisition, nor any advantages peculiar to itself; and it would see, with the greatest regret, that Mexico should oppose any obstacle to the accomplishment of an enterprise which promises so much convenience to the whole commercial world, and such eminent advantages to Mexico herself. Impressed with these sentiments and these convictions, the Government will continue to exert all proper efforts to bring about the necessary arrangement with the Republic of Mexico for the speedy completion of the work.

For some months past the Republic of Nicaragua has been the theatre of one of those civil convulsions, from which the cause of free institutions, and the general prosperity and social progress of the States of Central America, have so often and so severely suffered. Until quiet shall have been restored, and a government apparently stable shall have been organized, no advance can prudently be made in disposing of the questions pending between the two countries.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1851.

NEW SERIES.....No. 2.

I am happy to announce that an inter-oceanic communication from the mouth of the St. John to the Pacific has been so far accomplished as that passengers have actually traversed it, and merchandise has been transported over it; and when the canal shall have been completed, according to the original plan, the means of communication will be further improved.

It is understood that a considerable part of the railroad across the Isthmus of Panama has been completed, and that the mail and passengers will in future be conveyed thereon.

Whichever of the several routes between the two oceans may ultimately prove most eligible for travelers to and from the different States on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico and our coast on the Pacific, there is little reason to doubt that all of them will be useful to the public, and will liberally reward that individual enterprise by which alone they have been or are expected to be carried into effect.

Peace has been concluded between the contending parties in the Island of St. Domingo, and it is hoped upon a durable basis. Such is the extent of our commercial relations with that Island, that the United States cannot fail to feel a strong interest in its tranquility.

The office of Commissioner to China remains unfilled; several persons have been appointed, and the place has been offered to others, all of whom have declined its acceptance, on the ground of the inadequacy of the compensation. The annual allowance by law is six thousand dollars, and there is no provision for any outfit. I earnestly recommend the consideration of this subject to Congress. Our commerce with China is highly important, and is becoming more and more so, in consequence of the increasing intercourse between our ports on the Pacific coast and Eastern Asia. China is understood to be a country in which living is very expensive, and I know of no reason why the American commissioner sent thither should not be placed, in regard to compensation, on an equal footing with ministers who represent this country at the courts of Europe.

By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be seen that the aggregate receipts for the last fiscal year amounted to $52,312,979 87; which, with the balance in the Treasury on the 1st July, 1850, gave, as the available means for the year, the sum of $58,917,524 36.

The total expenditures for the same period were $48,005,878 68.

The total imports for the year ending 30th June, 1851, were.....	$215,725,995
Of which there were in specie.....	4,967,901
The exports for the same period were.....	217,517,130
Of which there were of domestic products.....	$178,546,555
Foreign goods reexported.....	9,738,695
Specie.....	29,231,880

Since the 1st of December last the payments in cash on account of the public debt, exclusive of interest, have amounted to $7,501,456 56; which, however, includes the sum of $3,242,400 paid under the 12th article of the treaty with Mexico, and the further sum of $2,591,213 45, being the amount of awards to American citizens under the late treaty with Mexico, for which the issue of stock was authorized, but which was paid in cash from the Treasury.

The public debt on the 20th ultimo, exclusive of the stock authorized to be issued to Texas by the act of 9th September, 1850, was $62,560,395 26.

The receipts for the next fiscal year are estimated at $51,800,000, which, with the probable unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 30th June next, will give, as the probable available means for that year, the sum of $63,258,743 09.

It has been deemed proper, in view of the large expenditures consequent upon the acquisition of territory from Mexico, that the estimates for the next fiscal year should be laid before Congress in such manner as to distinguish the expenditures so required from the otherwise ordinary demands upon the Treasury.

The total expenditures for the next fiscal year are estimated at $42,892,299 19; of which there is required for the ordinary purposes of the Government, other than those consequent upon the acquisition of our new Territories, and deducting the payments on account of the public debt, the sum of $33,343,198 08; and for the purposes connected directly or indirectly with those Territories, and in the fulfillment of the obligations of the Government, contracted in consequence of their acquisition, the sum of $9,549,101 11.

If the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the expenditures required for these Territories shall be met by corresponding action on the part of Congress, and appropriations made in accordance therewith, there will be an estimated unappropriated balance in the Treasury on the 30th June, 1853, of $20,366,443 90, wherewith to meet that portion of the public debt due on the first July following, amounting to $6,237,931 35, as well as any appropriations which may be made beyond the estimates.

In thus referring to the estimated expenditures on account of our newly-acquired Territories, I may express the hope that Congress will concur with me in the desire that a liberal course of policy may be pursued towards them, and that every obligation, express or implied, entered into in consequence of their acquisition, shall be fulfilled by the most liberal appropriations for that purpose.

The value of our domestic exports for the last fiscal year, as compared with those of the previous year, exhibit an increase of $43,646,322. At first view this condition of our trade with foreign nations would seem to present the most flattering hopes of its future prosperity. An examination of the details of our exports, however, will show that the increased value of our exports for the last fiscal year is to be found in the high price of cotton which prevailed during the first half of that year, which price has since declined about one half.

The value of our exports of breadstuffs and provisions, which it was supposed the incentive of a low tariff and large importations from abroad would have greatly augmented, has fallen from $68,701,921 in 1847, to $26,051,373 in 1850, and to $21,948,653 in 1851, with a strong probability, amounting almost to a certainty, of a still further reduction in the current year.

The aggregate values of rice exported during the last fiscal year, as compared with the previous year, also exhibit a decrease amounting to $460,917; which, with a decline in the values of the exports of tobacco for the same period, make an aggregate decrease in these two articles of $1,156,751.

The policy which dictated a low rate of duties on foreign merchandise, it was thought by those who promoted and established it, would tend to benefit the farming population of this country, by increasing the demand and raising the price of agricultural products in foreign markets.

The foregoing facts, however, seem to show, incontestably, that no such result has followed the adoption of this policy. On the contrary, notwithstanding the repeal of the restrictive corn laws in England, the foreign demand for the products of the American farmer has steadily declined, since the short crops and consequent famine in a portion of Europe have been happily replaced by full crops and comparative abundance of food.

It will be seen, by recurring to the commercial statistics for the past year, that the value of our domestic exports has been increased in the single item of raw cotton by $40,000,000 over the value of that export for the year preceding. This is not due to any increased general demand for that article, but to the short crop of the preceding year, which created an increased demand and an augmented price for the crop of last year. Should the cotton crop now going forward to market be only equal in quantity to that of the year preceding, and be sold at the present prices, then there would be a falling off in the value of our exports for the present fiscal year of at least $40,000,000, compared with the amount exported for the year ending 30th June, 1851.

The production of gold in California for the past year seems to promise a large supply of that metal from that quarter for some time to come. This large annual increase of the currency of the world must be attended with its usual results. These have been already partially disclosed in the enhancement of prices and a rising spirit of speculation and adventure, tending to overtrading, as well at home as abroad. Unless some salutary check shall be given to these tendencies, it is to be feared that importations of foreign goods beyond a healthy demand in this country will lead to a sudden drain of the precious metals from us, bringing with it, as it has done in former times, the most disastrous consequences to the business and capital of the American people.

The exports of specie to liquidate our foreign debt during the past fiscal year have been $24,263,979 over the amount of specie imported. The exports of specie during the first quarter of the present fiscal year have been $14,651,827. Should specie continue to be exported at this rate for the remaining three quarters of this year, it will drain from our metallic currency, during the year ending 30th June, 1852, the enormous amount of $58,607,308.

In the present prosperous condition of the national finances, it will become the duty of Congress to consider the best mode of paying off the public debt. If the present and anticipated surplus in the Treasury should not be absorbed by appropriations of an extraordinary character, this surplus should be employed in such way, and under such restrictions, as Congress may enact, in extinguishing the outstanding debt of the nation.

By reference to the act of Congress approved 9th September, 1850, it will be seen that in consideration of certain concessions by the State of Texas, it is provided that the "United States shall pay to the State of Texas the sum of ten millions of dollars, in a stock bearing five per cent. interest, and redeemable at the end of fourteen years, the interest payable half yearly at the Treasury of the United States."

In the same section of the law it is further provided "that no more than five millions of said stock shall be issued until the creditors of the State holding bonds and other certificates of stock of Texas, for which duties on imports were specially pledged, shall first file at the Treasury of the United States releases of all the claims against United States, for or on account of said bonds or certificates, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by the President of the United States."

The form of release thus provided for has been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved. It has been published in all the leading newspapers in the commercial cities of the United States, and all persons holding claims of the kind specified in the foregoing proviso were required to file their releases (in the form thus prescribed) in the Treasury of the United States, on or before the first day of October, 1851. Although this publication has been continued from the 25th day of March, 1851, yet up to the 1st October last comparatively few releases had been filed by the creditors of Texas.

The authorities of the State of Texas, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, have furnished a schedule of the public debt of that State created prior to her admission into the Union, with a copy of the laws under which each class was contracted.

I have, from the documents furnished by the State of Texas, determined the classes of claims which, in my judgment, fall within the provisions of the act of Congress of the 9th of September, 1850.

On being officially informed of the acceptance by Texas of the propositions contained in the act referred to, I caused the stock to be prepared, and the five millions which are to be issued unconditionally, bearing an interest of five per cent., from the 1st day of January, 1851, have been for some time ready to be delivered to the State of Texas. The authorities of Texas, up to the present time, have not authorized any one to receive this stock, and it remains in the Treasury Department, subject to the order of Texas.

The releases, required by law to be deposited in the Treasury, not having been filed there, the remaining five millions have not been issued. This last amount of the stock will be withheld from Texas until the conditions upon which it is to be delivered shall be complied with by the creditors of that State, unless Congress shall otherwise direct by a modification of the law.

In my last annual message, to which I respectfully refer, I stated briefly the reasons which induced me to recommend a modification of the present tariff, by converting the ad valorem into a specific duty, wherever the article imported was of such a character as to permit it, and that such a discrimination should be made in favor of the industrial pursuits of our own country as to encourage home production, without excluding foreign competition.

The numerous frauds which continue to be practised upon the revenue, by false invoices and undervaluations, constitute an unanswerable reason for adopting specific instead of ad valorem duties in all cases where the nature of the commodity does not forbid it. A striking illustration of these frauds will be exhibited in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the custom-house valuation of articles imported under a former law subject to specific duties, when there was no inducement to undervaluation, and the custom-house valuations of the same articles, under the present system of ad valorem duties, so greatly reduced as to leave no doubt of the existence of the most flagrant abuses under the existing laws. This practical evasion of the present law, combined with the languishing condition of some of the great interests of the country, caused by over-importations and consequent depressed prices, and with the failure in obtaining a foreign market for our increasing surplus of breadstuffs and provisions, has induced me again to recommend a modification of the existing tariff.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, which accompanies this communication, will present a condensed statement of the operations of that important department of the Government.

It will be seen that the cash sales of the public lands exceed those of the preceding year, and that there is reason to anticipate a still further increase, notwithstanding the large donations which have been made to many of the States, and the liberal grants to individuals as a reward for military services. This fact furnishes very gratifying evidence of the growing wealth and prosperity of our country.

Suitable measures have been adopted for commencing the survey of the public lands in California and Oregon. Surveying parties have been organized, and some progress has been made in establishing the principal base and meridian lines. But further legislation and additional appropriations will be necessary before the proper subdivisions can be made, and the general land system extended over those remote parts of our territory.

On the 3d of March last an act was passed providing for the appointment of three commissioners to settle private land claims in California. Three persons were immediately appointed, all of whom, however, declined accepting the office, in consequence of the inadequacy of the compensation. Others were promptly selected, who, for the same reason, also declined; and it was not until late in the season that the services of suitable persons could be secured. A majority of the commissioners convened in this city on the 10th of September last, when detailed instructions were given to them in regard to their duties. Their first meeting for the transaction of business will be held in San Francisco on the 8th day of the present month.

I have thought it proper to refer to these facts, not only to explain the causes of the delay in filling the commission, but to call your attention to the propriety of increasing the compensation of the commissioners. The office is one of great labor and responsibility, and the compensation should be such as to command men of a high order of talents and the most unquestionable integrity.

The proper disposal of the mineral lands of California is a subject surrounded by great difficulties. In my last annual message I recommended the survey and sale of them in small parcels, under such restrictions as would effectually guard against monopoly and speculation. But upon further information, and in deference to the opinions of persons familiar with the subject, I am inclined to change that recommendation, and to advise that they be permitted to remain, as at present, a common field, open to the enterprise and industry of all our citizens, until further experience shall have developed the best policy to be ultimately adopted in regard to them. It is safer to suffer the inconvenience that now exists, for a short period, than, by premature legislation, to fasten on the country a system founded in error, which may place the whole subject beyond the future control of Congress.

The agricultural lands should, however, be surveyed and brought into market with as little delay as possible, that the titles may become settled, and the inhabitants stimulated to make permanent improvements, and enter on the ordinary pursuits of life. To effect these objects it is desirable that the necessary provision be made by law for the establishment of land offices in California and Oregon, and for the efficient prosecution of the surveys at an early day.

Some difficulties have occurred in organizing the territorial governments of New Mexico and Utah; and, when more accurate information shall be obtained of the causes, a further communication will be made on that subject.

In my last annual communication to Congress, I recommended the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau, and I take this occasion again to invoke your favorable consideration of the subject.

Agriculture may justly be regarded as the great interest of our people. Four fifths of our active population are employed in the cultivation of the soil, and the rapid expansion of our settlements over new territory is daily adding to the number of those engaged in that vocation. Justice and sound policy, therefore, alike require that the Government should use all the means authorized by the Constitution to promote the interests and welfare of that important class of our fellow-citizens. And yet it is a singular fact, that whilst the manufacturing and commercial interests have engaged the attention of Congress during a large portion of every session, and our statutes abound in provisions for their protection and encouragement, little has yet been done directly for the advancement of agriculture. It is time that this reproach to our legislation should be removed; and I sincerely hope that the present Congress will not close their labors without adopting efficient means to supply the omissions of those who have preceded them.

An agricultural bureau, charged with the duty of collecting and disseminating correct information as to the best modes of cultivation, and of the most effectual means of preserving and restoring the fertility of the soil, and of procuring and distributing seeds, and plants, and other vegetable productions, with instructions in regard to the soil, climate, and treatment best adapted to their growth, could not fail to be, in the language of Washington, in his last annual message to Congress, a "very cheap instrument of immense national benefit."

Regarding the act of Congress, approved 28th September, 1850, granting bounty lands to persons who had been engaged in the military service of the country, as a great measure of national justice and munificence, an anxious desire has been felt, by the officers intrusted with its immediate execution, to give prompt effect to its provisions. All the means within their control were, therefore, brought into requisition to expedite the adjudication of claims; and I am gratified to be able to state, that near one hundred thousand applications have been considered, and about seventy thousand warrants issued, within the short space of nine months. If adequate provision be made by law to carry into effect the recommendations of the Department, it is confidently expected that, before the close of the next fiscal year, all who are entitled to the benefits of the act will have received their warrants.

The Secretary of the Interior has suggested in his report various amendments of the laws relating to pensions and bounty lands, for the purpose of more effectually guarding against abuses and frauds on the Government: to all of which I invite your particular attention.

The large accessions to our Indian population consequent upon the acquisition of New Mexico and California, and the extension of our settlements into Utah and Oregon, have given increased interest and importance to our relations with the aboriginal race.

No material change has taken place within the last year in the condition and prospects of the Indian tribes who reside in the Northwestern Territory and west of the Mississippi river. We are at peace with all of them; and it will be a source of pleasure to you to learn that they are gradually advancing in civilization and the pursuits of social life.

Along the Mexican frontier, and in California and Oregon, there have been occasional manifestations of unfriendly feeling, and some depredations committed. I am satisfied, however, that they resulted more from the destitute and starving condition of the Indians than from any settled hostility toward the whites. As the settlements of our citizens progress towards them, the game upon which they mainly rely for subsistence is driven off or destroyed, and the only alternative left to them is starvation or plunder. It becomes us to consider, in view of this condition of things, whether justice and humanity, as well as an enlightened economy, do not require that, instead of seeking to punish them for offences which are the result of our own policy towards them, we should not provide for their immediate wants, and encourage them to engage in agriculture, and to rely on their labor, instead of the chase, for the means of support.

Various important treaties have been negotiated with different tribes during the year, by which their title to large and valuable tracts of country has been extinguished: all of which will, at the proper time, be submitted to the Senate for ratification.

The joint commission under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo has been actively engaged in running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico. It was stated in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Interior that the initial point on the Pacific and the point of junction of the Gila with the Colorado river had been determined, and the intervening line, about one hundred and fifty miles in length, run and marked by temporary monument. Since that time a monument of marble has been erected at the initial point, and permanent landmarks of iron have been placed at suitable distances along the line.

The initial point on the Rio Grande has also been fixed by the commissioners at latitude 32° 22', and at the date of the last communication the survey of the line had been made thence westward about one hundred and fifty miles, to the neighborhood of the copper mines.

The commission on our part was at first organized on a scale which experience proved to be unwieldy and attended with unnecessary expense. Orders have, therefore, been issued for the reduction of the number of persons employed within the smallest limits consistent with the safety of those engaged in the service and the prompt and efficient execution of their important duties.

Returns have been received from all the officers engaged in taking the census in the States and Territories, except California. The superintendent employed to make the enumeration in that State has not yet made his full report, from causes, as he alleges, beyond his control. This failure is much to be regretted, as it has prevented the Secretary of the Interior from making the decennial apportionment of representatives among the States, as required by the act approved May 23, 1850. It is hoped, however, the returns will soon be received, and no time will then be lost in making the necessary apportionment, and in transmitting the certificates required by law.

The Superintendent of the Seventh Census is diligently employed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in classifying and arranging, in tabular form, all the statistical information derived from the returns of the marshals, and it is believed that when the work shall be completed it will exhibit a more perfect view of the population, wealth, occupations, and social condition of a great country than has ever been presented to the world. The value of such a work, as the basis of enlightened legislation, can hardly be overestimated; and I earnestly hope that Congress will lose no time in making the appropriations necessary to complete the classifications, and to publish the results in a style worthy of the subject and of our national character.

The want of a uniform fee bill, prescribing the compensation to be allowed district attorneys, clerks, marshals, and commissioners in civil and criminal cases, is the cause of much vexation, injustice, and complaint. I would recommend a thorough revision of the laws on the whole subject, and the adoption of a tariff of fees which, as far as practicable, should be uniform, and prescribe a specific compensation for every service which the officer may be required to perform. This subject will be fully presented in the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

In my last annual message I gave briefly my reasons for believing that you possessed the constitutional power to improve the harbors of our great lakes and sea-coast, and the navigation of our principal rivers, and recommended that appropriations should be made for completing such works as had already been commenced, and for commencing such others as might seem to the wisdom of Congress to be of public and general importance. Without repeating the reasons then urged, I deem it my duty again to call your attention to this important subject. The works on many of the harbors were left in an unfinished state, and, consequently, exposed to the action of the elements, which is fast destroying them. Great numbers of lives and vast amounts of property are annually lost for want of safe and convenient harbors on the lakes. None but those who have been exposed to that dangerous navigation can fully appreciate the importance of this subject. The whole Northwest appeals to you for relief, and I trust their appeal will receive due consideration at your hands.

The same is in a measure true in regard to some of the harbors and inlets on the sea-coast.

The unobstructed navigation of our large rivers is of equal importance. Our settlements are now extending to the sources of the great rivers which empty into, and form a part of the Mississippi, and the value of the public lands in those regions would be greatly enhanced by freeing the navigation of those waters from obstructions. In view, therefore, of this great interest, I deem it my duty again to urge upon Congress to make such appropriations for these improvements as they may deem necessary.

The survey of the Delta of the Mississippi, with a view to the prevention of the overflows that have proved so disastrous to that region of country, have been nearly completed, and the reports thereof are now in course of preparation, and will shortly be laid before you.

The protection of our southwestern frontier, and of the adjacent Mexican States, against the Indian tribes within our border, has claimed my earnest and constant attention. Congress having failed, at the last session, to adopt my recommendation that an additional regiment of mounted men specially adapted to that service should be raised, all that remained to be done was to make the best use of the means at my disposal. Accordingly, all the troops adapted to that service that could properly be spared from other quarters have been concentrated on that frontier, and officers of high reputation selected to command them. A new arrangement of the military posts has also been made, whereby the troops are brought nearer to the Mexican frontier and to the tribes they are intended to overawe.

Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to realize all the benefits that are expected to result from these arrangements, but I have every reason to hope that they will effectually check their marauding expeditions. The nature of the country, which furnishes little for the support of an army, and abounds in places of refuge and concealment, is remarkably well adapted to this predatory warfare; and we can scarcely hope that any military force, combined with the greatest vigilance, can entirely suppress it.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo we are bound to protect the territory of Mexico against the incursions of the savage tribes within our border "with equal diligence and energy" as if the same were made within our territory or against our citizens. I have endeavored to comply, as far as possible, with this provision of the treaty. Orders have been given to the officers commanding on that frontier to consider the Mexican territory and its inhabitants as equally with our own entitled to their protection; and to make all their plans and arrangements with a view to the attainment of this object. Instructions have also been given to the Indian commissioners and agents among these tribes, in all treaties, to make the clauses designed for the protection of our own citizens apply also to those of Mexico. I have no reason to doubt that these instructions have been fully carried into effect. Nevertheless, it is probable that, in spite of all our efforts, some of the neighboring States of Mexico may have suffered, as our own have, from depredations by the Indians.

To the difficulties of defending our own territory, as above mentioned, are superadded, in defending that of Mexico, those that arise from its remoteness, from the fact that we have no right to station our troops within her limits, and that there is no efficient military force on the Mexican side to cooperate with our own. So long as this shall continue to be the case, the number and activity of our troops will rather increase than diminish the evil, as the Indians will naturally turn towards that country where they encounter the least resistance. Yet these troops are necessary to subdue them, and to compel them to make and observe treaties. Until this shall have been done, neither country will enjoy any security from their attacks.

The Indians in California, who had previously appeared of a peaceable character, and disposed to cultivate the friendship of the whites, have recently committed several acts of hostility. As a large portion of the reinforcements sent to the Mexican frontier were drawn from the Pacific, the military force now stationed there is considered entirely inadequate to its defence. It cannot be increased, however, without an increase of the Army; and I again recommend that measure as indispensable to the protection of the frontier.

I invite your attention to the suggestions on this subject, and on others connected with his Department, in the report of the Secretary of War.

The appropriations for the support of the Army during the current fiscal year ending 30th June next, were reduced far below the estimate submitted by the Department. The consequence of this reduction is a considerable deficiency, to which I invite your early attention.

The expenditures of that Department, for the year ending 30th June last, were $9,060,268 58. The estimates for the year commencing 1st July next and ending June 30, 1853, are $7,898,775 83; showing a reduction of $1,161,492 75.

The Board of Commissioners, to whom the management of the affairs of the Military Asylum created by the act of 3d March last was intrusted, have selected a site for the establishment of an asylum in the vicinity of this city, which has been approved by me, subject to the production of a satisfactory title.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will exhibit the condition of the public service under the supervision of that Department. Our naval force afloat during the present year has been actively and usefully employed in giving protection to our widely-extended and increasing commerce and interests in the various quarters of the globe, and our flag has everywhere afforded the security and received the respect inspired by the justice and liberality of our intercourse, and the dignity and power of the nation.

The expedition commanded by Lieutenant De Haven, dispatched in search of the British commander, Sir John Franklin, and his companions in the Arctic Seas, returned to New York in the month of October, after having undergone great peril and suffering from an unknown and dangerous navigation and the rigors of a northern climate, without any satisfactory information of the objects of their search, but with new contributions to science and navigation from the unfrequented polar regions. The officers and men of the expedition, having been all volunteers for this service, and having so conducted it as to meet the entire approbation of the Government, it is suggested, as an act of grace and generosity, that the same allowances of extra pay and emoluments be extended to them that were made to the officers and men of like rating in the late Exploring Expedition to the South Seas.

I earnestly recommend to your attention the necessity of reorganizing the naval establishment, apportioning and fixing the number of officers in each grade, providing some mode of promotion to the higher grades of the Navy, having reference to merit and capacity, rather than seniority or date of entry into the service, and for retiring from the effective list upon reduced pay those who may be incompetent to the performance of active duty. As a measure of economy, as well as of efficiency in this arm of the service, the provision last mentioned is eminently worthy of your consideration.

The determination of the questions of relative rank between the sea officers and civil officers of the Navy, and between officers of the Army and Navy, in the various grades of each, will also merit your attention. The failure to provide any substitute, when corporal punishment was abolished for offences in the Navy, has occasioned the convening of numerous courts-martial upon the arrival of vessels in port, and is believed to have had an injurious effect upon the discipline and efficiency of the service. To moderate punishment from one grade to another is among the humane reforms of the age; but to abolish one of severity, which applied so generally to offences on ship-board, and provide nothing in its stead, is to suppose a progress of improvement in every individual among seamen which is not assumed by the legislature in respect to any other class of men. It is hoped that Congress, in the ample opportunity afforded by the present session, will thoroughly investigate this important subject, and establish such modes of determining guilt, and such gradations of punishment, as are consistent with humanity and the personal rights of individuals, and at the same time shall insure the most energetic and efficient performance of duty and the suppression of crime in our ships of war.

The stone dock in the navy-yard at New York, which was ten years in process of construction, has been so far finished as to be surrendered up to the authorities of the yard. The dry-dock at Philadelphia is reported as completed, and is expected soon to be tested and delivered over to the agents of the Government. That at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, is also nearly ready for delivery; and a contract has been concluded, agreeably to the act of Congress at its last session, for a floating section dock on the bay of San Francisco. I invite your attention to the recommendation of the Department touching the establishment of a navy-yard in conjunction with this dock on the Pacific. Such a station is highly necessary to the convenience and effectiveness of our fleet in that ocean, which must be expected to increase with the growth of commerce and the rapid extension of our whale fisheries over its waters.

The Naval Academy at Annapolis, under a revised and improved system of regulations, now affords opportunities of education and instruction to the pupils quite equal, it is believed, for professional improvement, to those enjoyed by the cadets in the Military Academy. A large class of acting midshipmen was received at the commencement of the last academic term, and a practice-ship has been attached to the institution, to afford the amplest means for regular instruction in seamanship, as well as for cruises during the vacations of three or four months in each year.

The advantages of science in nautical affairs have rarely been more strikingly illustrated than in the fact stated in the report of the Navy Department, that, by means of the wind and current charts, projected and prepared by Lieutenant Maury, the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory, the passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific ports of our country has been shortened by about forty days.

The estimates for the support of the Navy and Marine Corps the ensuing fiscal year will be found to be $5,856,472 19, the estimates for the current year being $5,900,621.

The estimates for special objects under the control of this Department amount to $2,684,220 89, against $2,210,980 for the present year, the increase being occasioned by the additional mail service on the Pacific coast and the construction of the dock in California, authorized at the last session of Congress, and some slight additions under the head of improvements and repairs in navy-yards, buildings, and machinery.

I deem it of much importance to a just economy, and a correct understanding of naval expenditures, that there should be an entire separation of the appropriations for the support of the naval service proper from those for permanent improvements at navy-yard sand stations, and from ocean steam-mail service, and other special objects assigned to the supervision of this Department.

The report of the Postmaster General, herewith communicated, presents an interesting view of the progress, operations, and condition of his Department.

At the close of the last fiscal year, the length of mail routes within the United States was 196,290 miles; the annual transportation thereon 53,272,252 miles; and the annual cost of such transportation $3,421,754.

The length of the foreign-mail routes is estimated at 18,349 miles, and the annual transportation therein at 615,206 miles. The annual cost of this service is $1,472,187, of which $448,937 is paid by the Post Office Department, and $1,023,250 is paid through the Navy Department.

The annual transportation within the United States (excluding the service in California and Oregon, which is now, for the first time, reported and embraced in the tabular statements of the Department) exceeds that of the preceding year 6,162,855 miles, at an increased cost of $547,110.

The whole number of post offices in the United States on the 30th day of June last was 19,796. There were 1,698 post offices established, and 256 discontinued during the year.

The gross revenues of the Department for the fiscal year, including the appropriations for the franked matter of Congress, of the Departments, and officers of Government, and excluding the foreign postages, collected for, and payable to, the British post office, amounted to $6,727,866 78.

The expenditures for the same period (excluding $20,599 49, paid under an award of the Auditor, in pursuance of a resolution of the last Congress, for mail service on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers in 1832 and 1833, and the amount paid to the British post office for foreign postages collected for and payable to that office) amounted to $6,024,566 79; leaving a balance of revenue over the proper expenditures of the year of $703,299 99.

The receipts for postages during the year (excluding the foreign postages collected for and payable to the British post office) amounted to $6,345,747 21, being an increase of $997,610 79, or 18.65-100 per cent. over the like receipts for the preceding year.

The reduction of postage, under the act of March last, did not take effect until the commencement of the present fiscal year. The accounts for the first quarter, under the operation of the reduced rates, will not be settled before January next; and no reliable estimate of the receipts for the present year can yet be made. It is believed, however, that they will fall far short of those of the last year. The surplus of the revenues now on hand is, however, so large that no further appropriation from the Treasury in aid of the revenues of the Department is required for the current fiscal year; but an additional appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1853, will probably be found necessary when the receipts of the first two quarters of the fiscal year are fully ascertained.

In his last annual report the Postmaster General recommended a reduction of postage to rates which he deemed as low as could be prudently adopted, unless Congress was prepared to appropriate from the Treasury, for the support of the Department, a sum more than equivalent to the mail services performed by it for the Government. The recommendations of the Postmaster General, in respect to letter postage, except on letters from and to California and Oregon, were substantially adopted by the last Congress. He now recommends adherence to the present letter rates, and advises against a further reduction until justified by the revenue of the Department.

He also recommends that the rates of postage on printed matter be so revised as to render them more simple, and more uniform in their operation upon all classes of printed matter. I submit the recommendations of the report to your favorable consideration.

The public statutes of the United States have now been accumulating for more than sixty years, and, interspersed with private acts, are scattered through numerous volumes; and, from the cost of the whole, have become almost inaccessible to the great mass of the community. They also exhibit much of the incongruity and imperfection of hasty legislation. As it seems to be generally conceded that there is no "common law" of the United States to supply the defects of their legislation, it is most important that that legislation should be as perfect as possible, defining every power intended to be conferred, every crime intended to be made punishable, and prescribing the punishment to be inflicted. In addition to some particular cases spoken of more at length, the whole criminal code is now lamentably defective. Some offences are imperfectly described, and others are entirely omitted; so that flagrant crimes may be committed with impunity. The scale of punishment is not in all cases graduated according to the degree and nature of the offence, and is often rendered more unequal by the different modes of imprisonment, or penitentiary confinement, in the different States.

Many laws of a permanent character have been introduced into appropriation bills, and it is often difficult to determine whether the particular clause expires with the temporary act of which it is a part, or continues in force. It has also frequently happened that enactments and provisions of law have been introduced into bills, with the title or general subject of which they have little or no connection or relation. In this mode of legislation so many enactments have been heaped upon each other, and often with but little consideration, that, in many instances, it is difficult to search out and determine what is the law.

The Government of the United States is emphatically a government of written laws. The statutes should, therefore, as far as practicable, not only be made accessible to all, but be expressed in language so plain and simple as to be understood by all, and arranged in such method as to give perspicuity to every subject. Many of the States have revised their public acts with great and manifest benefit; and I recommend that provision be made by law for the appointment of a commission to revise the public statutes of the United States, arranging them in order, supplying deficiencies, correcting incongruities, simplifying their language, and reporting them to Congress for its action.

An act of Congress, approved 30th September, 1850, contained a provision for the extension of the Capitol, according to such plan as might be approved by the President, and appropriated one hundred thousand dollars to be expended under his direction, by such architect as he should appoint to execute the same. On examining the various plans which had been submitted by different architects, in pursuance of an advertisement by a committee of the Senate, no one was found to be entirely satisfactory, and it was therefore deemed advisable to combine and adopt the advantages of several.

The great object to be accomplished was to make such an addition as would afford ample and convenient halls for the deliberations of the two Houses of Congress, with sufficient accommodations for spectators, and suitable apartments for the committees and officers of the two branches of the Legislature. It was also desirable not to mar the harmony and beauty of the present structure, which, as a specimen of architecture, is so universally admired. Keeping these objects in view, I concluded to make the addition by wings, detached from the present building, yet connected with it by corridors. This mode of enlargement will leave the present Capitol uninjured, and afford great advantages for ventilation and the admission of light, and will enable the work to progress without interrupting the deliberations of Congress. To carry this plan into effect, I have appointed an experienced and competent architect. The corner-stone was laid on the 4th day of July last, with suitable ceremonies, since which time the work has advanced with commendable rapidity, and the foundations of both wings are now nearly complete.

I again commend to your favorable regard the interests of the District of Columbia, and deem it only necessary to remind you that although its inhabitants have no voice in the choice of Representatives in Congress, they are not the less entitled to a just and liberal consideration in your legislation. My opinions on this subject were more fully expressed in my last annual communication.

Other subjects were brought to the attention of Congress in my last annual message, to which I would respectfully refer. But there was one of more than ordinary interest, to which I again invite your special attention. I allude to the recommendation for the appointment of a commission to settle private claims against the United States. Justice to individuals, as well as to the Government, imperatively demands that some more convenient and expeditious mode than an appeal to Congress should be adopted.

It is deeply to be regretted that in several instances officers of the Government, in attempting to execute the law for the return of fugitives from labor, have been openly resisted, and their efforts frustrated and defeated by lawless and violent mobs; that in one case such resistance resulted in the death of an estimable citizen, and in others serious injury ensued to those officers and so individuals who were using their endeavors to sustain the laws. Prosecutions have been instituted against the alleged offenders, so far as they could be identified, and are still pending. I have regarded it as my duty, in these cases, to give all aid legally in my power to the enforcement of the laws, and I shall continue to do so wherever and whenever their execution may be resisted.

The act of Congress for the return of fugitives from labor is one required and demanded by the express words of the Constitution.

The Constitution declares, "That no person 'held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.'" This constitutional provision is equally obligatory upon the Legislative, the Executive, and Judicial Departments of the Government, and upon every citizen of the United States.

Congress, however, must, from necessity, first act upon the subject, by prescribing the proceedings necessary to ascertain that the person is a fugitive, and the means to be used for his restoration to the claimant. This was done by an act passed during the first term of President Washington, which was amended by that enacted by the last Congress, and it now remains for the Executive and Judicial Departments to take care that these laws be faithfully executed. This injunction of the Constitution is as peremptory and as binding as any other; it stands exactly on the same foundation as that clause which provides for the return of fugitives from justice, or that which declares that no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed, or that which provides for an equality of taxation according to the census, or the clause declaring that all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States, or the important provision that the trial of all crimes shall be by jury. These several articles and clauses of the Constitution, all resting on the same authority, must stand or fall together. Some objections have been urged against the details of the act for the return of fugitives from labor; but it is worthy of remark that the main opposition is aimed against the Constitution itself, and proceeds from persons and classes of persons, many of whom declare their wish to see that Constitution overturned. They avow their hostility to any law which shall give full and practical effect to this requirement of the Constitution. Fortunately, the number of these persons is comparatively small, and is believed to be daily diminishing, but the issue which they present is one which involves the supremacy and even the existence of the Constitution.

Cases have heretofore arisen in which individuals have denied the binding authority of acts of Congress, and even States have proposed to nullify such acts, upon the ground that the Constitution was the supreme law of the land, and that those acts of Congress were repugnant to that instrument; but nullification is now aimed, not so much against particular laws as being inconsistent with the Constitution, as against the Constitution itself; and it is not to be disguised that a spirit exists and has been actively at work to rend asunder this Union, which is our cherished inheritance from our revolutionary fathers.

In my last annual message I stated that I considered the series of measures, which had been adopted at the previous session, in reference to the agitation growing out of the Territorial and slavery questions, as a final settlement in principle and substance of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced; and I recommend adherence to the adjustment established by those measures, until time and experience should demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse. I was not induced to make this recommendation because I thought those measures perfect, for no human legislation can be perfect. Wide differences and jarring opinions can only be reconciled by yielding something on all sides, and this result had been reached after an angry conflict of many months, in which one part of the country was arrayed against another, and violent convulsion seemed to be imminent. Looking at the interests of the whole country, I felt it to be my duty to seize upon this compromise as the best that could be obtained amid conflicting interests, and to insist upon it as a final settlement, to be adhered to by all who value the peace and welfare of the country. A year has now elapsed since that recommendation was made. To that recommendation I still adhere, and I congratulate you and the country upon the general acquiescence in these measures of peace which has been exhibited in all parts of the Republic. And not only is there this general acquiescence in these measures, but the spirit of conciliation which has been manifested in regard to them in all parts of the country has removed doubts and uncertainties in the minds of thousands of good men concerning the durability of our popular institutions, and given renewed assurance that our Liberty and our Union may subsist together for the benefit of this and all succeeding generations.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, December 2, 1851.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed for the use of the members; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. B. then moved that 15,000 copies extra of the President's message and the accompanying documents be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. EVANS inquired whether that was the usual number?

Mr. BAYLY responded in the affirmative.

The question being put upon the resolution, it was concurred in.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to know whether, if the House adjourn now, the first business in order in the morning will be the drawing for seats under the resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, in consequence of the limitation, that the time will have expired.

Several MEMBERS. Then let us proceed now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If that is true, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] will withdraw his motion, that we may execute that business now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it has expired quite as much now as it would to-morrow.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to my colleague that he withdraw his motion to adjourn, and move to postpone the order until half past twelve o'clock, to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS: "Agreed!" "Agreed!"

Mr. STANTON withdrew his motion to adjourn.

Mr. JONES moved that the order for drawing for seats be postponed until half-past twelve o'clock, to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JONES,

The House thereupon adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. OLDS: A bill extending to Louis Kossuth the privileges of citizen of the United States of America.

By Mr. PEASLEE: A bill entitled "An act authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire, for advances made for the use of the United States in repelling invasions, and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream in said State."

Also, a bill entitled "An act for the settlement and payment of the claims of the State of New Hampshire for the services of her militia and for disbursements for military purposes during the late war with Great Britain."

By Mr. SIBLEY: A bill to grant to the Territory of Minnesota certain lands for the construction of a railroad from the falls of St. Louis river of Lake Superior to a point on the Mississippi river.

A bill to provide for the construction of, and continuation of, certain roads in the Territory of Minnesota.

A bill to provide for the removal of obstructions in the Mississippi river, above the Falls of St. Anthony.

A bill to provide for the appointment of a surveyor general of public lands in the Territory of Minnesota.

A bill to provide for the establishment of an additional land district in the Territory of Minnesota.

MEMORIALS.

The following memorials were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. STANTON of Kentucky: The memorial of William V. Morris of Kentucky, asking that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay him his portion of the prize money awarded by Congress to those engaged in the expedition against the enemy on Lake Bourgne, in the year 1815.

Also, the memorial of William H. Scott, for indemnity for loss sustained by the failure of the Postmaster General to give him a mail route agreeably to contract.

Also, the memorial of the heirs of Philip R. Rice, praying payment for a vessel impressed into the service of the United States during the revolutionary war, and lost while in the service.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 3, 1851.

The Hon. R. F. STOCKTON, of New Jersey, appeared in his seat, and was sworn.

Mr. SEWARD asked and obtained leave to withdraw the petition and papers of Nancy King, praying for compensation for the services of her father, a revolutionary soldier.

NOTICES.

Mr. MORTON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way to a railroad from Pensacola Bay, in the State of Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and a grant of land to aid in the construction of said road.

Mr. GEYER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Missouri the right of way, and a portion of the public lands, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from St. Louis to the western limits of that State.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice of his intention to introduce a joint resolution relative to printing the returns of the Seventh Census.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution making land warrants assignable.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ATCHISON, pursuant to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a donation of a portion of the public lands to the State of Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to St. Joseph's, in said State; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORTON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way to the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad Company through the public lands, and appropriating lands to the State of Florida in aid of the construction of said railroad and branches; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

SECOND READING OF BILLS.

The following bills were read a second time, and, until the appointment of committees, were laid upon the table:

A bill granting land to the State of Iowa in aid of the construction of a railroad in said State;

A bill granting to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in said State.

RECEPTION AND ENTERTAINMENT OF KOSSUTH.

The following joint resolution came up in its order, and was read a second time:

Joint Resolution in relation to the reception and entertainment of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, in the United States.

Be it, &c., That a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, to consist of — members of the Senate and — members of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the Presiding Officers of the respective Houses to make suitable arrangements for the reception of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, on his arrival in the United States, and to communicate to him assurances of the profound respect entertained for him by the people of the United States; and to tender to him, on the part of Congress, and in the name of the people of the United States, the hospitalities of the Metropolis of the Union.

The resolution being before the Senate, Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I shall not undertake to address the Senate at length upon the resolution. I have already stated the reasons which induced me to offer it. It has been laid upon the tables of honorable Senators for some days. They have had a fair opportunity of examining it. They know the object of it. They know all the circumstances connected with it. I trust we shall have a unanimous vote in favor of the passage of the resolution. I hope that no delay will be interposed here, because the other House will have no opportunity of acting upon it in time if we delay its passage. I understand that Governor Kossuth is expected in New York to-day, and if we are to receive him in a manner which is supposed to be proper by the Government and by all intelligent persons, with one or two exceptions, with whom I have conversed, it seems to me that we ought at once to adopt such a resolution as the one before the Senate.

As there are two blanks in the resolution, I move to fill them in such manner as to make the joint committee to consist of three members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLEMENS. Reference has been made in the message of the President to a resolution passed by the two Houses of Congress at the last session in relation to Kossuth and his companions. My recollection of the terms of that resolution may be wrong, and therefore I ask that it may be read.

The SECRETARY read the resolution, as follows: A Resolution for the relief of Louis Kossuth and his Associates, exiles from Hungary.

Whereas the people of the United States sincerely sympathize with the Hungarian exiles, Kossuth and his associates, and fully appreciate the magnanimous conduct of the Turkish Government in receiving and treating these noble exiles with kindness and hospitality; and if it be the wish of these exiles to emigrate to the United States, and the will of the Sultan to permit them to leave his dominions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is requested to authorize the employment of some one of the public vessels which may now be cruising in the Mediterranean to receive and convey to the United States the said Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the motion to fill the blanks respectively with the figures "3" and "5."

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, perhaps it would be as well to meet the question at once upon the proposition to fill these blanks. I am not prepared myself, as a representative of one of the States of this Union, to adopt this resolution. As an individual, as a citizen of the United States, I am willing to show to Kossuth that respect which my judgment and my feelings may dictate; but in my capacity as a Senator I cannot consent to what is here proposed. I know of no precedent in the history of our legislation which would justify the adoption of this resolution. I have never known such marked distinction shown to any distinguished citizen of our own country, whether a military man or a civilian. I see nothing in the character of this distinguished individual which should make the Government of the United States get up a great pageant on his account, and distinguish him from all other men who have ever lived. Has he ever been connected with our institutions? Has he ever rendered any particular service to this country to entitle him to this mark of distinction? Not at all. It is true he is a great man, but he is not greater than many men who now live, and who have lived. His position is such as to call into exercise our sympathies for him and his associates as men. That sympathy this Government has already shown to an extent almost unparalleled by sending one of the national vessels to receive him and his associates, if they were willing to come to this country. Have we not done enough to show our sympathies and our good feelings? I think we have. Against the man's character and course I utter not a word. The American heart is open for his reception. It is the people who will receive him. It is the people and not the Government that ought to receive him. Lafayette, when he came to this country, was received in a manner which was justifiable on the part of the Government of that day, because he was connected with the Revolution which gave us the liberties which we enjoy.

But, sir, I did not intend to discuss this question. I do not, however, wish the Senate or the country to understand that my sympathies towards Kossuth are not as strong as the sympathies of the Senator from Mississippi. I only object to the manner in which it is proposed to receive him.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia, that he withdraw all opposition to this resolution in its present stage, and let it be amended to suit his friends; as I believe the most usual course is to allow the friends of a measure first to perfect it before a discussion ensues on its merits. After the amendments proposed by the Senator from Mississippi shall have been adopted or rejected, I have an amendment which I propose to offer, and which I hope will meet the concurrence of the Senate, and which may possibly make the resolution more acceptable to the Senator from Georgia. My amendment will be to add at the close of the resolution these words:

"And also to assure him and his associates in exile of the sympathy of the Congress and people of the United States with the victims of oppression everywhere, and that their earnest desire is that the time may speedily arrive when the rights of man shall be universally recognized and respected by every people and Government of the world."

If it be added to the resolution, I think it will obviate the objection of the Senator from Georgia; because then, instead of being personal to Kossuth, it would apply to the victims of oppression everywhere, without any distinction.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I shall not attempt at the present time to discuss this resolution at large; but I feel bound to express the deep grief and the profound surprise which I must necessarily feel at such opposition arising in such a quarter. The Senator from Georgia says that such honors as are proposed to be rendered by this resolution have never been heretofore rendered to any distinguished foreigner, excepting Lafayette. That is probably true; but whether true or not, it seems to me to be a matter of the utmost unimportance. The gentleman says, by way of assigning a reason for his course on this occasion, that he sees nothing that distinguishes this individual from many other illustrious persons connected with the affairs of nations. In that respect I differ from him very much, and I have the very signal advantage of being sustained by the united public sentiment of the civilized world.

I did not expect that any intelligent member of this body would undertake to say, in view of the striking facts now presented in all parts of the civilized world—in view of that universal outbreak of sympathy, of respect, of profound admiration, and deep gratitude almost universally presented throughout Christendom towards this individual—that he could see no difference between him and many others. There has been but one WASHINGTON, and there is but one Kossuth. And so the whole civilized world determines. Is the gentleman familiar—he ought to be—he doubtless must be—with the illustrious history of this distinguished person in his own country? Does he know that he is equally distinguished in war as in peace—distinguished in legislation, distinguished in the performance of high executive functions?

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask the gentleman to name the battle in which he was ever distinguished.

Mr. FOOTE. If the gentleman will take his time I might, in due season, give a biographical sketch of Kossuth for his benefit. But there has been a book published recently which he can purchase at a small price, and which will give him full information on the subject. While I should be willing to instruct that gentleman, and all other members of the Senate, according to my ability, if I had leisure, and to accompany the bestowal of this instruction with the pronunciation of a well-known couplet, which runs thus:

"Delightful task, to rear the tender thought, on the subject of human freedom; yet I do not consider the present opportunity the best one which could be desired, either for the bestowal of instruction, or the reception of information with regard to the historic point in question.
And teach the young idea how to shoot!"—

I was proceeding to say, that the Senator from Georgia was bound to know that Governor Kossuth was distinguished in war; distinguished in peace; distinguished as a public speaker, perhaps above all others now living; distinguished as a profound statesman; distinguished also in the management of the fiscal concerns of his country; distinguished for his noble disinterestedness evinced under all the circumstances of a varied public career; distinguished for his thorough devotion to civil and religious liberty; distinguished for the extraordinary sacrifices he has made in the cause of human freedom; distinguished for the noble stand he has taken for the liberties of his countrymen against the tyrannical Government of Austria, aided and sustained by the still more tyrannical and unprincipled Government of the Czar of Russia.

Sir, this man has performed acts, he is the author of achievements that must hand him down to future ages as the man of the present age—more illustrious in all respects, in my judgment, than any other man that the present generation has produced in any quarter of the world. Of a pure and unblemished character, amiable in disposition; a stern, unbending republican, though utterly opposed to the accursed doctrines of socialism; possessed of a moral courage which enabled him to declare, even in the midst of a monarchical people, his unqualified respect and admiration for republican institutions,—such is Kossuth. We have invited him hither. Why? Because we understood his merits; because we appreciated his sufferings; because we sympathized thoroughly with him, as an illustrious public character; because we knew that the American people sympathized with him most profoundly. What we did at the last session on this subject has been approved of by our constituents. I do not believe that there has been the least censure bestowed upon the Senate of the United States for the passage of the resolution of the last session, in any quarter of this broad Republic. Having had some hand in the passage of that resolution—having in fact brought it forward here for adoption, I have felt a natural inclination to scrutinize the state of public feeling in reference to it; and I feel authorized to declare, that I have not yet heard the language of condemnation applied to us anywhere, or by any person whatsoever. What now do we propose to do? Having invited Governor Kossuth to this country—having, by our kind offices, accomplished the deliverance of this illustrious individual and his associates from captivity—having secured to him and to them the means of coming to this country, where, if he chooses to remain he can permanently enjoy the blessings of civil and religious freedom;—having thus established in behalf of this glorious Republic, by our interposition in this case of unmerited suffering, the admiration and respect of the whole civilized world, we find him now ready to land upon our shores, as the invited guest of the nation. The Administration at Washington—(the President)—recollecting that it was at the instance of Congress that one of our ships of war was sent forth to bring Kossuth and his associates to this country as the guest of the Republic, being unwilling to exhibit even the appearance of desiring to monopolize the glory appertaining to this imposing transaction, in his solemn annual message, read in our hearing yesterday, invites, in the most formal manner, the attention of Congress to this interesting subject, and recommends, in strong and emphatic language, the adoption of some suitable plan for the exercise of such hospitalities as he judges to be proper on this occasion. In other words, he calls upon us to accord an appropriate reception to the noble personage whom we have deliberately invited to come within our borders. I have already stated that I have not intruded this resolution upon the Senate without due consultation; indeed, from certain personal considerations, I should rather have desired some other gentleman to have moved in the matter, had not the worthy Secretary of State (Mr. Webster) some days ago called my attention specially to the subject, informing me in advance what would be the recommendation of the President in regard to the point under consideration, and desiring me, as the mover of the original resolution of the last session, to offer to the Senate a resolution substantially corresponding to the one now under consideration. It is under such promptings from a high Whig source, that a Democrat, inflexibly devoted to the principles of his party, conceived it proper that he should, to some extent, rise above mere party considerations, and coöperate with the Administration of the country for the time being in this generous undertaking.

I must say that I am surprised that, under the circumstances mentioned, gentlemen who are the peculiar friends, avowedly, of this same Administration, should rise up and present the stern and unbending opposition which it has been my fate to experience, to a simple and unavoidable act of national courtesy. Yet I am not so much surprised as I might have been a few days ago, had the same development been then made; for I discover in certain quarters that hints have been already given, that it would be a dangerous thing for Kossuth to be allowed to come to this country and deliver such bold and soul-stirring harangues in favor of the great principles of which he is the champion, from the fear that his eloquence might have the effect of unduly liberalizing the minds of the people of America, and might impart a still more republican cast to the minds of the thinking millions of this country. I know very well that political bigotry in several noted quarters has already undertaken to sneer at all attempts even to do simple justice to the character of this distinguished man. I know that base and unprincipled calumniators, (who will, I trust, be very soon exposed to the unmitigated indignation and scorn of the civilized world,) in advance of the landing of Governor Kossuth upon our shores, have undertaken to calumniate him seriously in regard to certain delicate circumstances connected with his leaving the steamer Mississippi at Gibraltar. I have looked into the charges which have been brought, and the evidence adduced in support of them, and I thank God that I have seen already, in advance of his coming into our midst, a triumphant vindication of all these heartless allegations. I beg leave to declare here, that the attempt which has been made to poison the public mind of America towards this excellent personage—to instil undue prejudice into the minds of the enlightened people of this country in regard to this illustrious victim of oppression—is, in my judgment, altogether the most disgraceful act of the kind that has yet marked our annals as a nation. When I first saw the insidious and fiendish epistle which was sent across the briny deep for the purpose of awakening prejudice in the American mind in regard to this long-suffering patriot and true republican, I was full of grief, of disgust, and of indignation; and I rejoice that this opportunity has been unexpectedly afforded to me of pouring forth the deep, and, I might almost say, inexpressible indignation which I feel at the concerted, cold-blooded injustice done to this noble personage by the corrupt and mercenary scribblers of faction. I had hoped, sir, that in the American Senate—a body heretofore noted for its courtesy, respected for its liberality, and which was once distinguished above all other legislative assemblies in the world for its true and inflexible devotion to the great principles of civil and religious liberty—no such ungenerous opposition would have been presented as that which it has been fated to encounter; which opposition, I must say, derives all its importance from the fact that it has originated in a quarter of unequivocal respectability.

Sir, the gentleman from Georgia seems to overlook the fact, that there is a great struggle going on at this moment in all parts of the civilized world between the principles of freedom and the principles of slavery. The tyrants of the earth have combined for the overthrow of liberty. In some instances open attempts are made to break down political and religious freedom. In others, the means employed by the enemies of freedom are more disguised and insidious, but not at all less dangerous. At such a moment does it behoove the American people to join the side of despotism, or to stand by the cause of freedom? We must do one or the other. We cannot avoid the solemn alternative presented. Those who are not for us are against us. Those who are not for freedom are for slavery.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman says "exactly." I shall deal with him very exactly, presently. I am using such language as I deem suited to the ears of statesmen. I am employing such phraseology as has received an acceptance perfectly understood amongst real statesmen—among men of a genuine elevation of character—who are capable of breathing elsewhere than in the impure atmosphere of faction; who are something more than the wretched demagogues of the hour; who are able, when a great question like this is under consideration, to elevate themselves somewhat above the behests of an unreasoning fanaticism. I say, sir, I am using language which, amongst such men—the statesmen, the true philanthropists, the enlightened philosophers of the world—is perfectly comprehended and appreciated. Yet, my simple words seem not to be comprehended in a certain quarter. I am asserting such views as have constantly been misunderstood in the same quarter ever since I have had the honor of holding a seat in this body, and I trust that the apparently unconquerable blindness which has constantly marked the course of certain inflated demagogues whom I could easily specify—(not here, of course, or who should not be here, certainly)—will continue undiminished, until Jehovah himself shall determine that the fitting time has come for pouring out upon their heads that deluge of fiery indignation which their manifold offences are calling forth.

I have nothing of a special character to say in regard to the gentleman's amendment at present. It would not now be seasonable to speak of it upon its merits. Every one understands why that amendment has been suggested; and if it shall be hereafter brought forward in a regular and formal manner, I will undertake to suggest the motives in which it has originated. I shall express the regret which I feel that every attempt which we make here to do our duty as Senators is either impeded or counteracted by persons who, with the most high-flown professions of philanthropy and disinterestedness ever upon their lips, are never so well satisfied with themselves as when they acquire a little contemptible notoriety by the perpetration of acts which look alone to the production of some social mischief, either temporary or permanent, and which may perchance serve to call into renewed action those elements of domestic excitement and discord, which I must suppose every good man in the land hoped might terminate forever.

Sir, I wish to make one more remark before I take my seat. The eminent personage whose claims upon our respect and sympathy I have endeavored to make manifest, has commended himself especially to my regard by the delicate and discreet forbearance which he has elsewhere exercised in avoiding all indecent interference with the domestic institutions of other countries than his own. Whilst in monarchical England, he did not hesitate to avow his decided partiality for republican institutions, yet no one can accuse him of uttering a word upon any occasion which was in the least degree calculated to awaken popular discontent or to foment civil discord; and I venture to predict, sir, that if the vicious and contriving factionists who have so fiercely struggled for several years past to disturb the domestic quiet of the Republic should attempt to enlist him in their unholy designs, they will incur such a withering rebuke from his lips as will make them wish, for a moment at least, that the Almighty in his providence had never permitted such miscreants to pollute the pure air of heaven with their pestilential breath.

Mr. HALE. I did not expect that the brief notice which I gave of the amendment which I propose to offer to this resolution, would call forth exactly the course of remark to which it has been subjected; and still less did I conceive that it was to lay up in store such a further castigation as is threatened when the honorable Senator from Mississippi shall disclose the motives of the mover of the amendment. I had supposed that it was in order for a man to declare his own motives, because he was supposed to be advised what they were; but when he goes further than that, and undertakes to disclose the motives of other persons, if he does not transgress the rules of good taste and Christian charity, he does transgress those of the Senate; and it is not competent for him within the rules of the Senate to undertake to assign to a Senator motives different from those which he himself proclaims, and which appear upon the face of the proposition which he makes. Whenever the Senator shall undertake to enter into the motives which have impelled me to action, I will endeavor to meet him either by argument or by calling him to order.

I have but a word to say to the honorable Senator. He says there are some minds, "not here, of course," that is, I suppose, not in his seat, that cannot understand language as statesmen use it. Why cannot they? Now, if there ever was a man that delivered illustrated lectures, and demonstrated the truth of his propositions as he went along, it was that honorable Senator. What is this amendment? Why, that we shall assure to this illustrious man, as dear to my affections as to his—dear to my affections for the principles which he has advocated, and for the maintenance and advocacy of which he is now an exile—that we shall assure him and his associates in exile of the sympathy of the Congress and the people of the United States not only with them but with the victims of oppression everywhere. This, sir, is evidence that somebody does not understand the English language as statesmen use it. We sympathize with the victims of oppression everywhere, and that is evidence that there is a faction in the country that wants to arouse those sectional feelings which have been so happily buried. What more is there that shows a want of apprehension and comprehension, and understanding of statesman-like language? Why, that it is our earnest desire that the time may speedily come when the rights of man shall be universally recognized and respected by every people and government of the world. Is there any intimation there that the honorable Senator means to find fault with? Does he mean to intimate that in this land there is a place where the rights of man are not respected and recognized? If he does, he utters a fouler slander upon the country and upon some of the States of the Confederacy, than I would allow myself to utter in this place. It seems to me that he is wanting in an apprehension and comprehension of the fair meaning of language when he sees anything sinister or covert in that. What is the color of these words? What is the complexion? What is the odor of them that has waked up such a tornado in the Senator's breast, and stirred up such a magazine of wrath as is to be poured out on the motives I had in suggesting this poor amendment?

The honorable Senator accuses me of putting myself forward to seek notoriety. No, sir, I have only attempted in an humble way to be bobtail to the kite he has set flying. That is all. As to this little amendment to the resolution which he has introduced, I can assure him that there is nothing sinister, nothing covert, nothing agitating or intended for agitation in it. I had hoped that agitation was dead, and that the agitators would be stilled. I had hoped that this subject of slavery was, as we have been told so many times, quietly and peaceably settled—that the Wilmot proviso was dead; and that those few who have stood here, who used to advocate it, were only the tombstones to point out where it was buried. But when I came into the Senate this morning, I found upon my table a resolution which the public journals tell us the Senator from Mississippi gave notice that he should offer. That resolution, which is to be introduced at a future day, is one declaring that the measures of adjustment, so called—naming them every one, one after another, seriatim—are to be considered as a final and definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery. That brings up the whole subject again. It brings up all those acts, the fugitive slave law included. It opens the whole door of discussion, and introduces all these agitating questions which we had all hoped were so quietly buried long ago. Now, let no gentleman retort upon me that I am in favor of agitation. I used to be in favor of it, but I got sick of it, and I am still sicker of it when I see the gentlemen who have been so long declaiming against it are the very gentlemen to introduce these matters to the Senate. I am tired of agitation here, because I am satisfied that no good can be produced here—not the least. I had hoped that here the whole subject was quieted. But what does it mean? Is there a monopoly of sympathy and admiration for the distinguished patriots of the Old World? Cannot those of us who are so unfortunate as to live in Northern climes under the influence of the cold winds and the freezing atmosphere of our Northern latitude—if our hearts do sometimes get warm and melted by the glow of enthusiasm and sympathy, that is waked up and roused by the manly, noble, generous, self-sacrificing patriots of other lands—in Heaven's name, if the blood begins to flow in our cold hearts, can we not speak? Must we still the throbbing pulses of humanity, and suffer gentlemen from another latitude to monopolize all the sympathy, and all the admiration, and all the zeal that is to be displayed for great deeds of great men in behalf of great causes?

The honorable Senator says that the despots of the world are linked together, and that there is a conflict between liberty and slavery. Well, I want, according to my poor understanding of the terms, to enroll myself under the banners of those who are fighting the battles of liberty. I do not want to be found amid the hosts of those that are sustaining the cause of slavery, and driving the Kossuths of the Old World to seek refuge here. And may I not, although I am not gifted with such keen perceptions, such flowing thoughts, and such eloquent diction as the honorable Senator from Mississippi, in my own poor way speak what I feel moving in my own heart, without subjecting myself to such a reproach?

Sir, I do not want to be a leader. I do not want to go ahead. I am content to follow. Two years ago, when an honorable Senator from Michigan, now in my eye, [Mr. Cass,] gave utterance to some sentiments which I thought did honor to him, honor to the age, and honor to the Senate, on a proposition to suspend diplomatic intercourse with Austria on account of the course which she pursued, I then proposed an amendment to put Russia into the same category. I took occasion at that time to be not a leader but a follower of the great and distinguished men of the Senate who had taken the lead in giving direction to public sentiment and expressing the sympathies of Congress and of the people with the victims of oppression that were seeking our shores for an asylum for protection. It seems to me that a man who can find fault with this expression—with an expression of sympathy with the victims of oppression the world over—a man that can find fault with the utterance of a prayer that that day may arrive which the prophets of old have predicted shall be the day when the principles of humanity and Christianity shall influence all nations and all people,—the man that can find fault with the expression of such a sentiment, must poorly understand the principles of civil liberty, the principles of humanity, or those which should guide enlightened and humane statesmen.

If there is anything that is exceptionable and objectionable in the amendment which I have suggested, it is not on the face of the paper; and I deny the right of the Senator from Mississippi, or anybody else, to look beyond the paper—to look beyond what appears patent upon its face and manifest in its plain declarations, to seek for hidden motives of action which he may choose to denominate as corrupt and improper, as tending to secure illicit ends by illicit means. I am ready, for one, to say that I entertain the fullest sympathy with Kossuth. I entertain the highest respect for him. Let the honorable Senator from Mississippi pour forth his eloquence, and speak as never man spake in behalf of the illustrious stranger to whom he proposes to do honor; let him put it upon the ground that it is because he has been true in Hungary, true in England, and I trust in God will be true here, to the maintenance of those principles for the maintaining of which he is an exile. The Senator cannot go beyond me. I feel it all. I sympathize with it all, and I want to turn it into no narrow or sectional current. I want it to do what the honorable Senator says some narrow-minded men are afraid that it will do—liberalize the minds of many of the multitude, and infuse Democratic sentiments into the hearts of the great masses of the people. That is the very object I propose. That is what I want. I wish Kossuth to come here, in his very person, a living reproach to despotism of whatever name and wherever it may be. I want him to go about among the people of the land, the living advocate of the rights of man, so that everybody, wherever he may be, who feels in his own breast that he is guilty of any invasion or infraction of these rights, when he looks into the face of Kossuth may see there the lineaments that speak out reproach. That is the reason why I honor him, and that is the reason why I wish him to come here.

There are other victims of oppression. There are the victims of English oppression. The people of this country have been moving lately to get the kind offices of this Government to interfere in behalf of O'Brien, Mitchell, and their associates. I want this resolution to reach them. I want to let it go just exactly as far as the history of the United States goes. I want it to go, as was eloquently said by a distinguished orator of this country to Lafayette when he was here, speaking to him of the voice of Washington that was raised in his behalf, that that voice of sympathy could reach him even in the dungeons of Austria. Well, if there are victims of oppression in the dungeons of Austria, or of any other Government on earth, I want this expression of the sentiments of the American people to be broad enough to reach them. I want Kossuth, and Mitchell, and O'Brien, and everybody else that is suffering in the great cause of human rights and human liberty, to feel that here, without division and without partiality, there is the entertainment of an honest and earnest and zealous respect for the course they have pursued.

It is the honorable Senator from Mississippi, sir, who has undertaken to sectionalize, and localize, and give a narrow meaning to words which, in their fair import, admit of no such meaning. It is he, if anybody, that has a mind so diseased upon this subject, so gangrened with particular local applications of a great principle, that he cannot view it in the light of a statesman, philanthropist, and Christian. If he has any such, let him lay them all aside. Let him be assured that in this work at least he shall have the sympathy and cooperation of all those who love liberty, and respect and venerate its advocates, irrespective of all extraneous considerations and conditions. These are the motives which I have. These are the motives which I entertain, and which have impelled me to suggest the amendment which I propose to offer. These are the motives which I stand by; and I deny to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, or to anybody else, the right to impute to me any other motives than these. If these motives which I have disclosed are such as are unworthy the occasion, unworthy of the place, or unworthy of the time, so be it. But they are the motives which have impelled me, and which I hope will be convincing with the majority of the Senate, so as to get their consent to modify the resolution. I hope that if it is so modified we shall have the concurrence of the honorable Senator from Georgia, for it will make the resolution general in its character.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. President, there are some gentlemen in this country whose principles are well known, and with whose public course the whole country is familiar. There are some public speakers in Congress, and out of it, who have been so much in the habit of discussing particular public topics in a certain unvarying mode, that the particular phraseology which they chance to employ, is perfectly understood by all who either hear or read their speeches. Now, sir, were the question propounded to any one here, what was the precise meaning intended to be attached to the amendment whose introduction has been menaced by the gentleman from New Hampshire, and the remarks with which it was accompanied, not the least difficulty could be possibly experienced in the rendition of a fitting response. Hear the language of this suggested amendment:

"And also to assure him and his associates in exile of the sympathy of the Congress and people of the United States with the victims of oppression everywhere."

Now we all know well what class of our population is alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire, when he speaks of "the victims of oppression." I have heard that very expression from his lips about one thousand times, and it always has seemed to intimate the same thing precisely. It was obviously designed to be expressive of a very peculiar sympathy for the colored races of this continent; and there is not now a member of the Senate that does not understand this amendment precisely as I do. So confident am I on this point, that I venture to assert that the Senator himself dare not deny that such is the true interpretation of the words of his proposed amendment. Yet he has, I will not say the effrontery, from regard to the rules of the Senate, but he has such a wonderful amount of what may be called self-confidence, as to enable him with a tolerably unembarrassed countenance, to declare that he had no such sinister allusion as that which I have named. Sir, I was grieved and mortified to hear the grave denial of the honorable gentleman of a fact which appeared to me to admit of no negation whatever. Sir, allow me to aver that the honorable gentleman has not a personal friend in the world who will not hang down his head with shame at such a denial made under such circumstances. Why, what is this proposition of mine? It is simply a resolution which I have introduced, with the approval of the Administration here, in cordial cooperation with gentlemen from whom I have differed considerably upon questions formerly existing, which resolution asserts the expediency of providing a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress for the purpose of consulting as to the proper mode of receiving the renowned champion of Hungarian freedom at the Metropolis of the Union. This is all, sir, that I propose to do; and yet the Senator from New Hampshire, pretending all the while to be altogether friendly to the object set forth in the resolution, offers an amendment, the only effect of the adoption of which every sane man in the world must perceive could only have the effect of defeating all action on the subject. I ask him now, Can he deny, in the face of the Senate, that the proper interpretation of the language to which I have objected is that which I have affixed to it? Can he deny, in the hearing of this body, that it was his intention to express, by that amendment, particular sympathy for a certain portion of our population in the Southern States not of his own color or complexion? He cannot deny it, in my opinion, without the utmost confusion of face; and were he to deny it a thousand times, persons more illiberal than myself might suppose the gentleman had for the moment altogether forgotten himself. Yet he says that I myself complain of his having intruded the delicate topic of slavery upon the consideration of the Senate. Why, I am perfectly willing to leave the question between myself and the gentleman to any enlightened portion of his own constituency—indeed, to intelligent men anywhere; and I should confidently expect a decision that the honorable gentleman, if he intended by his amendment, to forward the passage of my resolution, has been particularly unfortunate in the adoption of means not in the least degree adapted to the attainment of his avowed object.

The gentleman has gone out of his way for the purpose of bringing before the Senate a resolution of which I yesterday gave notice. I shall not discuss that resolution now. I know it would be unparliamentary to do so. I only wish to offer a few remarks in reply to some observations which if unrequited would tend to put me in a wrong attitude before the country. The present Chief Magistrate of the United States in his first annual message declared that he recognized the series of measures constituting together what is called the plan of adjustment, as a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery. The same high functionary, in the message read to us yesterday, has again made the same declaration. Good men, patriots of both the old political parties North and South, have declared by overwhelming majorities in favor of this great scheme of pacification, and expressed their earnest desire that the country should be quieted on this subject now and forever. But there being some little opposition to these measures presented in several neighborhoods, and some indications of contemplated resistance, of a character more or less equivocal, it has been deemed expedient by several patriotic and discerning persons with whom I have had the honor to consult, that some formal declaration should be made by the two Houses of Congress, of a nature calculated to give assurance to the different sections of the Union of the existence of a reciprocal disposition in future to do full justice to each other. This resolution has been introduced for the purpose of quieting excitement and promoting a speedy restoration to a state of fraternal concord. Sir, it was neither my wish nor my intention to discuss that resolution; it was my earnest wish and confident hope, that the statesmen, the true patriots, the real philanthropists of the two Houses of Congress, without regard to ancient party designations, as a band of brothers, as an association of American patriots, would adopt such a resolution and give full and permanent quiet to the public mind.

Sir, if this debate had occurred two or three years ago, it might have been proper for me to have entered on a vindication of that system to which the gentleman alludes as a system of oppression. Happily that system stands fully vindicated by recent events before the habitable globe. Those who reside in the section of country where I have the honor to live, desire not at all to propitiate those who have deliberately resolved to hate us and our cherished institutions, whose business it has been for years past to decry us, and some of whom have evinced a willingness to do all that unscrupulous men could do for our degradation and ruin. Thank God, the people of the United States, without regard to sectional considerations, have of late nobly rushed to the rescue of the constitutional rights of that exposed section of the Union which I in part represent on this floor. The voice of faction is almost stilled even in places where the counsels of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire were held in high regard, and the noisy demagogues of the hour are beginning to feel the visitations of that contempt which should long since have withdrawn them from the view of respectable and well-deserving citizens.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I had hoped that this resolution would have met with no opposition; for we cannot conceal from ourselves the fact that it will lose a great part of its value, both at home and abroad, unless it meets with the unanimous consent of the two Houses of Congress. A strange spectacle is passing daily. There is an upheaving of the political system, of which no man can foretell the consequences. The despotism of ages has pressed upon most of the Governments. The people are striving to recover their long-lost liberty, wading, in the expressive language of Mr. Jefferson, through seas of blood to accomplish that object. Nation after nation rises in succession to break the iron yoke of despotism, and nation after nation is in succession put down by the union of the despotic Governments of Europe. Yes, sir; as soon as an attempt is made in one of the countries of Europe to recover the liberty which was formerly wrested from them, there is a union of the despotic powers, and they assume the right to march there and to control the public opinion and fortunes of that country. It is impossible but that every lover of liberty throughout the world, certainly every lover of liberty in our own country, should sympathize with these movements.

The great Hungarian leader needs no eulogy from me. He will live in the brightest pages of history. His eulogy is his conduct and his character through life. He has passed through the fiery furnace of a revolution and come out of it unscathed. He has been the leader of his country in one of the most terrible crises that a country ever passed through, and has never been successfully assailed in character or conduct. A leader in stormy times, a governor in a state of anarchy, misfortune has overwhelmed him; but the love of his country and the respect and admiration of mankind attach to him.

We have asked him to come here. We have invited him to our shores. The question now is, Are we going to turn our backs on him now? Shall we not sympathize with those movements? May we not, as public and as private men, express our own feelings and the feelings of our constituents in relation to him?

For my part, I see no reason, public, private, or political, why an expression of this feeling should not be made by the American people and Government: none whatever. The exiled Governor of Hungary does not come here merely as the champion of his country's independence, though in that character he is entitled to the sympathy and regard of every lover of liberty. But he comes here as the representative of a sacred cause—of a great and glorious cause, involving human rights in every nation of the globe. He comes here as that representative; and may we not, under these circumstances, receive him as such?

The insurrection of Hungary was no ordinary case. Had Hungary made her effort against the Austrian Government, and been put down by that Government, however much we might have regretted the result, we could have had nothing to say on the subject. But she had defeated Austria. The Austrian capital was taken, and the Emperor of Austria was compelled to fly from the seat of his power. Hungary would have maintained her independence, so far as we are able to judge, but for the interposition of Russia. What does Russia do? In a struggle in a portion of a country to maintain independence, she imports her armies there and puts down the efforts of the Hungarian people. She intervenes by the "armed hand;" and the American people and Government are to have no right to say that they are sorry for Hungary! Russia may spread her Cossacks over Europe, and restore the iron yoke of Austria and despotism, and yet we on this side of the Atlantic, are to have no right to express sympathy with the millions who are undergoing the trial there which we have undergone here! Providence conducted us to a happy issue, and I believe that the same Providence will eventually conduct them to the same issue.

The Senator from Georgia talks about "precedents." You cannot start a single proposition here but some one must turn to the Journals and see what has been done before. Some chimera—some imaginary evil that may happen a thousand years hence suggests itself. You are told to stop, for there is no "precedent" for your course. I came here to think for myself. They say this is an age of progress. I am rather an old man myself, and I have found it to be an age of progress. I, for one, have progressed pretty well, and I hope to live long enough to see still further progress. I am for expressing our opinions on this subject. I am for receiving Kossuth as the guest of the nation. I am for giving to him an imposing and solemn reception—one that will redound to our own credit, and be useful to the struggling millions of the globe.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire is a most adroit parliamentary tactician. That we all know. We all know perfectly well that many times when propositions came up he seemingly supported them, while he had the adroitness to tack a little tail to it, something or other which he knew perfectly well would defeat the original proposition, of which he seemed to be the friend. Two years ago this whole subject was before the Senate. I then expressed my sentiments in relation to suspending diplomatic intercourse with some of the nations of the Old World. I did not believe that when a nation by its character and conduct placed itself out of the pale of Christian feeling, we should hold political intercourse with it. I would not sit down to count the cost of such suspension. I would not go in to any arithmetical calculation of its effect in dollars and cents; but I would cut the strings of political intercourse at once. This matter was all gone over two years ago—I need not renew it at this time. When that proposition for suspending diplomatic intercourse with Austria was before us, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire said, in his strong and flowing language, that he was in favor of it, and all that kind of thing, and then moved an amendment to include Russia. He knew perfectly well that that would defeat the proposition. I will not say what was his motive, though we all know it perfectly well. If the gentleman had succeeded in having Russia included, other nations would have been brought in, and thus the original resolution would have been certainly defeated. The honorable gentleman then spoke in most eloquent terms of the terrible condition of those two Governments, and the necessity of cutting off intercourse with them; and yet his amendment was precisely calculated to defeat the whole object. Now, what has the gentleman done here? We have got another practical proposition before us—a proposition to receive a guest of the nation whom we have invited here. What does the gentleman do? He proposes to tack to that an abstract declaration of no practical effect, and perhaps it was not intended to have any. There is not a man within these walls that does not know what the gentleman means perfectly well. He means to bring up the old question of slavery, and he means by this declaration to defeat the present resolution, for he knows it cannot pass with such an amendment.

I am, therefore, opposed to this abstract declaration as to the rights of man, though I believe in my soul I am just as good a friend to them as the gentleman from New Hampshire. But he knows, and we all know, that such a declaration as this is intended to be a pronunciamento of the American Government against the institution of slavery, secured by the Constitution. He knows it cannot pass. He knows it should not pass. He knows we have no power to pass such a thing with such a view. When a proposition comes up of any practical description, in which the rights of man are concerned, I will go as far as any gentleman. But a proposition—I will not say intended, for that is un-Senatorial, otherwise I should—evidently having only the effect of throwing the firebrand of slavery into this Hall, renewing the agitating discussions which have subsisted for years, and which have now in some measure been happily quelled, should meet with the reprobation of every Senator. There is no excuse for it. It does no good to the original proposition, of which the honorable gentleman professes to be a supporter; for, if adopted, it would defeat that proposition. He knows that as well as I do. While I shall vote for the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, I shall vote against the amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, for the reasons I have stated, because it would be regarded as a declaration on the part of the Government against the institution of slavery in the Southern States.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind gentlemen that the amendment which has been discussed for some time has not been offered, and is not before the Senate. The amendment pending is to fill the blanks with "three" and "five," respectively.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am opposed to this resolution, Mr. President, and I want to assign the reasons which induce me to give the vote which I intend to give. In the first place, it seems to me to be the introduction of a subject into the Congress of the United States, which does not properly belong to the functions of the body. And in addition to that, it seems to me to be the introduction of a proposition upon which we are necessarily destitute of the proper information to enable us to come to a correct conclusion. Now, sir, what practical effect can our decision, the one way or the other, in regard to this resolution have, in a legislative sense, upon the interests of our constituents? None whatever. But how, in the other aspect of the question in which I have presented it, are you qualified to decide upon the merits and actions of all foreigners within their own countries in reference to pending revolutions there, and to come to an accurate conclusion as to whether they ought to be complimented or not?

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I would ask my friend whether he did or did not formerly vote for the resolution expressive of sympathy for Kossuth? He was very well informed at that time it seems.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Perhaps I might retort on my friend, and ask why he did not answer the question of my friend behind me, before putting one to me, and point out the battle-field where Kossuth distinguished himself. But I shall present it all in due time. The aspect of the case which I now suggest, is, that if this is to be a precedent to operate in all time to come to justify the Congress of the United States in taking up the matters of every distinguished foreigner, and in going into their respective claims to be complimented by it, it is a subject upon which, in its very nature, we perhaps are little qualified to decide. Some, with the great reading of my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] may be thoroughly acquainted with all the political and military movements of the country in which the revolution may be pending. But there may be others of us who are less informed, who have less acquaintance with the books to which he has referred us; and thus we may not have that accurate information upon which to decide whether the compliment ought to be given or not. But every Senator must perceive, that if we commence the system of complimenting foreigners for distinguished services in their own country in behalf of human liberty, there is no end; there is no limit to the exercise of this power, from this time forth forever. And that brings up a matter of the highest importance to the American people. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] foresaw the bearing of this whole subject two years ago, at the time he introduced a celebrated resolution, for which I proposed to substitute an amendment.

If you set this example, my word for it, you legitimate that intervention in the affairs of other nations which has been hostile to the genius of our Government and to the practice of every Administration from Washington down to this day. You run counter in that to the very recommendation of the message which we heard read yesterday, and thus an example is to be for the first time set in the history of our Government by which the doctrine of intervention in the affairs of all the nations of the earth is to be tolerated and legitimated. You give aid and assistance by countenance and by commendation. How long is it, after you begin your aid and assistance by words, before you must carry it out by deeds? How long are you to talk without acting? How long are you to express sentiments, fold your arms, and not carry those sentiments into practice? It is idle on the part of the American Congress to talk, to sympathize, to express abstract sentiments, unless in the progress of things they intend to execute their declarations. I have the authority of the distinguished Hungarian himself for all this. I have not been an inattentive observer to the progress of things. I have looked whenever I could into the declarations of all distinguished men. I see that Kossuth, in a recent speech which he has made, says your sympathies, your idle declarations in words amount to nothing unless you can act. True, he says "I do not call upon you to go to war, but I want you to intervene against intervention; I want you to say to those who will intervene, 'Hands off'; and when you make that declaration I want you to act in reference to it."

Now, Mr. President, I say, simple and insignificant as a mere compliment generally seems to be, although it is very grateful to the heart, the amount of dollars and cents in paying the bill of a distinguished foreigner you have already legitimated in the case of the Turkish envoy. True, I did not vote for it. I thought it a bad example and voted against it. But so far as the mere dollars and cents are concerned, we have a precedent; we have what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] seemed to call for. But you have never yet interfered in the affairs of nations by the declaration of a sentiment which might ultimately call for action. I ask the American Congress before they take this step, to consider well what may be its ultimate consequences. If I apprehend aright the nature of our institutions, they were not formed for any such purpose. If I know the Constitution of the United States, under which we happily live, it contains an imbediment of general powers for national purposes; and if we confine ourselves legitimately and strictly to the execution of those powers, we shall follow out the system, the example, the practice of our fathers, and not intervene by word or deed in the affairs of any nation in the world. It is utterly impossible that the nations of the earth are so ignorant as not to know the sentiments that actuate every American bosom. They know full well that we are all Democrats; that we are all Whigs; and that we are all Republicans. They know full well that in the bosom of every American there is a deep-seated principle in favor of the right of popular representation and self-government. They know full well that this lies at the foundation of all our institutions, and that we will never give it up for any consideration on earth. It is the principle on which our Government is based. It is the principle on which our lives will at any moment be staked. The nations of the earth know that full well. They want no information in regard to it. Your declarations here or elsewhere will give them no new light in reference to it.

Now when they know that, does it become us, upon every revolution in every part of the world, to manifest by an open declaration that we are glad that Kossuth in Hungary has led a reforming band and attempted to revolutionize the government under which he before lived? that we will be glad when some revolutionary Cromwell shall again rise in England and declare a Republic? that we will be glad when some Napoleon shall put down a French despot, and declare a Republic founded on the principle of the right of universal suffrage, after a while repealing it and getting clear of it? Do all these declarations, as revolution after revolution happens on the face of the earth, strengthen the great principle upon which American institutions are based—the right of self-government? In truth, sir, I do not conceive it to be our mission. I am a man of progress, as much so as the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] But the difference between him and me is as to the mode of action by which to propel the great, the magnificent, and the liberal governments of the world. If I understand his progress, it is to do it by war and conquest. He can swallow Mexico without being injured. I have no faith in that kind of progress. My system is to try and enlighten the substratum of society; to make all the nations of the world—the little boys and girls of the world—learn and understand their rights—civil, political, and religious. When you can indoctrinate mankind by teaching them what their rights are, and show them that the physical power belongs to the multitude, you have the foundation upon which to erect a pyramid of Republican government to enlighten the whole earth, just as ours is doing. But you might as well attempt to make a pyramid stand by inverting it, as to attempt by war and conquest to establish a government. It cannot be done. My idea of progress—and my idea of the destiny of this Republic in reference to the other nations of the world—is this: let us evince that we can govern ourselves upon principles of justice; that we administer justice without sale, denial, or delay, to every human being; and by this course of conduct constantly hold up before mankind the broad example of Republican government. If you can thus diffuse knowledge; if you can thus enlighten the people—the subjects of the other nations of the world—they will do just what Kossuth and his companions have been doing—they will abolish the exemption of taxation in reference to the nobles; they will abolish the privilege of the nobles to be exempt, except by their own consent, to the judicial tribunals of the country; they will extend the right of suffrage; and they will ultimately, from the knowledge which they have, adopt their institutions according to the circumstances by which they are surrounded, and make them what they ought to be. We have an example of the attempting to make Republican or Democratic governments where the people are not prepared for them, in South America, where there is little else than one military despot after another. Now, who can say how far Louis Kossuth is identified with the true American principle? No one.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. If the Senator will allow me, I will answer the question from the President's message.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I heard that read yesterday. It does not answer what I am after. Who can tell me that Louis Kossuth in any speech, in any vote, in any action of his life, has identified himself with the true American, Democratic representative principle, or with the Declaration of American Independence—that to the masses belongs all political power; that the government is formed for their use, for their benefit, and for their happiness, and that they have at all times the right to alter, modify, change, or repeal it?

Mr. FOOTE. I will state that Governor Kossuth said, in at least three speeches in England, that he was a republican after the American model, and that Washington was the great object of his admiration and imitation. He has said that before all Christendom.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He has then an additional title to my admiration. But surely if he has made that declaration in England, it was a declaration after the fact. I want to see the Declaration of Independence at the time the war was in progress. I want to see what they were fighting for at the time. When he is in exile, when he is in a country—England—where I admit human liberty is sustained to a very great extent, and when he is coming to a country like America, he would be very green indeed—if he intends to select it as his asylum and home, as I hope he may—he would be very green indeed, when making public speeches, if he did not assert his love, his admiration, his respect for the great men, and for the institutions of the country in which he is about to locate himself.

Mr. FOOTE. Governor Kossuth never said that he intended to locate himself in America. He said quite the contrary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not change the fact one iota. We have a declaration from Kossuth after the fact. What I have said I repeat: If any gentleman can show me a Hungarian Declaration of Independence—something upon which that revolution was based, like the American Government, and point me to the page and contents of it, I will receive the information with a great deal of thankfulness. No such document exists. I admit these reforms. They were great reforms. They were getting clear of the effect of feudal institutions like our own ancestors got clear of them. They were great and glorious changes for the people of Hungary. They helped to elevate the masses; and I am glad of it. But that government, if I understand it correctly, had been a government independent in its organization, governed by the Emperors of Austria as Kings of Hungary connected with the Hungarian Diet. The revolution broke out to sustain that state of things, with the reforms which the Diet had made. That is a short history of the matter, so far as I understand it. It was not connected with any of those democratic doctrines which are so dear to the American heart; at least if it was, it was not promulgated in any official shape to the world at the time. The very fact that I present this view of the subject, the very fact that other Senators present other views of the subject, which views conflict, show the utter impropriety of introducing a resolution of this sort into the American Congress. If this thing is to be tolerated as a precedent, if this is a beginning without end, whenever anything of this sort comes before us, we shall have to array ourselves in regard to the histories of the day; we shall have to ascertain whether the man performed his part in this battle, or in this council chamber, to enable us to come to a conclusion. Must we do all this?

One remark more. I believe there was a meeting in Tammany Hall not long ago. That hall sometimes puts balls in motion, not "solitary and alone," but in masses, that have a portentous influence, and seem to me to be ominous of the fate of my country. If I am correctly informed, the very idea suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] two years ago, of interfering by word, not yet by act—

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator allow me to set him right? I said that cutting the strings of communication with Austria was not an interference. I do not claim the right to interfere. But I do not say that I would not at the proper time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is ominous. He did not say that he would interfere; but he will not disclaim that he will at the proper time. That is the Tammany notion, according to my idea. Now, I say that if I should tell you, as a neighbor of mine, I will not hold any further intercourse with you for your conduct, that would be pretty direct interference. I have attempted to show that there may be interference by words. I come into your family. I undertake to say, You have lectured this boy improperly, you have spoken a harsh word to your wife, you are acting very improperly as a father and as a husband. That is an interference by word of mouth; it is an interference in domestic, family matters. I have endeavored to show that this is an interference with the nations of the world so far as words are concerned. This resolution expressly declares that we are to compliment Kossuth. It makes it the duty of the committee "to communicate to him assurances of the profound respect entertained for him by the people of the United States, and to tender to him, on the part of Congress, and in the name of the people of the United States, the hospitalities of the metropolis of the Union." And why all that? Because of his past actions? Inasmuch as you compliment him, you throw reproach upon those with whom he was warring. The question is, whether it is not interference by words?

And now to advert to this Tammany matter. They have, as I understand, intimated that it becomes necessary to change the well-settled policy of the country from the days of Washington down, that this doctrine of intervention is to supersede that of non-intervention, which has subsisted from the foundation of the Government to this time; and for which doctrine, reiterated in his present message, I compliment the President. I am opposed to that change. I think the world and the Government is not yet prepared for anything of the kind. I am not for making idle declarations which we are not to carry out. If we do intervene by word, I am for intervening by action also. But I am not for intervening in any way. I think the soundest policy for any man, family, or nation, is to mind its own business and let the business of other people alone. If we can intervene in this sense of the term in regard to Austria or England—and my friend from Mississippi has given notice of his resolution in regard to Smith O'Brien and his compatriots—we can perhaps take up the affairs of Napoleon.

Mr. FOOTE. Do I understand the gentleman as presenting any opposition to my O'Brien resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir. I do not know how it will be presented. I hope when it comes up it will be in such a shape that I can swallow it like my friend [Mr. Cass] can swallow Mexico.

I think the doctrine which I have advanced shows that if you can travel out of the United States and go into Europe, much more can the General Government go into the affairs of the States. I have said from the beginning, that our system divided the powers of government between the National and State Governments. I have said that certain subjects were local and domestic, that certain others were foreign and national, and that each government so managed its own affairs, and were just as separate and distinct in regard to the different powers under the National and State Constitutions, as are this Government and the other Governments of the world. Now, let this example be set; let us go into the affairs of Europe, and by expressing our opinions about European systems, European men, and European measures, and what reason is there that the American Congress could not get up and say, we express our opinions about State systems and State measures? And if you can look at tyranny, as you denominate it, in any part of the world, do you not tolerate the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hale,] whom I regard, in point of social intercourse, with a good deal of affection and esteem, although differing from him as to his political views—do you not tolerate and encourage him to get up and say, "I want to intervene a little; I think Kentucky has acted rather tyrannically; I think Georgia has rather a despotic system, and I want to express my sympathy with the oppressed?"

Sir, I am against this whole measure. Have we nothing to do but to talk away all our time on resolutions of this sort? Can we say to the American people that we have nothing that we can properly and usefully employ our time about, but that we must be ranging over the world to hunt up Kossuths, and O'Briens, and Napoleons, whom we must either compliment or condemn? Look at the Executive message! Look at the business to which you can turn your attention, and that profitably for the American people! Legislate! We have plenty of subjects of much more importance on which we can employ our time; and it does seem to me that we ought not to tolerate the introduction of resolutions complimenting or condemning Kossuth or O'Brien. If you can compliment, can you not condemn? Where is the difference in point of principle? If you compliment, which you now propose to do, does it not equally imply the power to condemn? Surely it does. And if we go into the condemnation of individuals, we can take the bear by the ear and shake him a little, and take the lion by the mane and shake him until we are tired; we can travel all over the Continent of Europe and do the same thing, and, not satisfied there, we can travel into Africa and Asia and condemn them all, one after another. Is that the legitimate business of the American Congress? Is that the thing for which we are sent here? Sir, when the American people begin to look at this thing, they will not tolerate it. There are a great many who think in regard to progress as I do. They are the farmers, the mechanic, the working professional men—men who have no office. It is the principle of the Government to protect them in all their rights, so that they can educate their children and live comfortably at home, and give them intellectual and moral improvement. These people, when they come to look at your complimenting Mr. Kossuth, or censuring the Emperor of Austria or the Czar of Russia, or anybody else, will be very apt to say, You are meddling with affairs which we did not send you to Congress to take up.

I did not intend to detain the Senate as long as I have in this desultory way, but I could not allow this resolution to pass without thus putting down the reasons for my opposition to it.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this matter until to-morrow at one o'clock, for the purpose of going into the election of Chaplain, which was the special order for one o'clock to-day.

Mr. BERRIEN. I beg to make one suggestion. The hour of one o'clock to-day was fixed for the election of Chaplain, in order that Senators might have notice of it and be present. Another subject has engaged their attention. I perceive that many seats in the Chamber are vacant. I submit to the honorable Senator from Missouri, whether it is proper to press the execution of that resolution under such circumstances? I hope that an earlier hour to-morrow will be indicated, so as to enable us to go into it before we get into a discussion on another subject.

Mr. ATCHISON. I look upon the election of a Chaplain as a matter of but very slight importance. I presume all the gentlemen whose names will be presented, will be good and pious men—such men as will answer the purpose. I presume the Senate is about as full now as it will be to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. BERRIEN. If the election of a Chaplain be in the consideration of the Senate a matter of as small importance as it is in that of the honorable Senator's from Missouri, it surely need not interrupt the discussion of this very interesting question. I believe we shall best discharge our duty by determining upon an hour to-morrow when we shall proceed to the election, making it our rule that it shall not be interrupted by any other subject—say twelve and a half o'clock. Justice to Senators who attach more importance to the election than the honorable Senator from Missouri, requires that they have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. ATCHISON. It is a matter of but little importance to me. I care not whether we postpone it or not. But the Senator from Georgia is very much mistaken if he supposes that I attribute to the resolution under discussion any great importance.

Mr. BERRIEN. I have not ascribed that opinion to the Senator. I have not supposed that he considers it of great importance; but it has been so pronounced by other Senators.

Mr. ATCHISON withdrew the motion to postpone.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor, but gave way to Mr. CASS, who said: I rise to make an explanation. It is simply this: In regard to the subject of interference, I wish to read General Washington's declaration in his memorable address to Mr. Genet, no less memorable for its sentiments than for the beauty of its diction:

"Born, sir, in a land of liberty; having early learned its value; having engaged in a perilous conflict to defend it; having, in a word, devoted the best years of my life to secure its permanent establishment in my own country,—my anxious recollections, my sympathetic feeling, and my best wishes, are irresistibly excited whenever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom."

What words can be stronger than General Washington's sympathy for the oppressed and struggling nations of the Old World. He never dreamed of marching armies there. His sympathy was excited, and he expressed it; and here I would beg the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to discriminate between interference and non-intercourse. If he does not discriminate between them, I beg he will turn to the dictionary. If I choose to have no intercourse with a man, it is not interfering with him. The ground assumed by the honorable Senator was taken two years ago, but I thought it had been given up by this time. If we cut off all intercourse with Austria, no man has a right to say we interfere with that Power.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] seems to be very much surprised that this resolution was brought forward at all. He seems to be inclined to impose on some of us a heavy responsibility. I am going to put the honorable Senator right on this matter, and let him see why action on this subject is recommended, and why the Executive Chief of this Government, even before any action on the part of Congress, expressed sympathy, the expression of which the honorable Senator so strongly condemns. Here is an extract from the President's message received yesterday:

"The Turkish Government has expressed its thanks for the kind reception given to the Sultan's agent, Amin Bey, on the occasion of his recent visit to the United States. On the 28th of February last, a dispatch was addressed by the Secretary of State to Mr. Marsh, the American Minister at Constantinople, instructing him to ask of the Turkish Government permission for the Hungarians, then imprisoned within the dominions of the Sublime Porte, to remove to this country. On the 3d of March last, both Houses of Congress passed a resolution requesting the President to authorize the employment of a public vessel to convey to this country Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity."

"The instruction above referred to was complied with, and the Turkish Government having released Governor Kossuth and his companions from prison, on the 10th of September last they embarked on board of the United States steam-frigate Mississippi, which was selected to carry into effect the resolution of Congress. Governor Kossuth left the Mississippi at Gibraltar for the purpose of making a visit to England, and may shortly be expected in New York. By communications to the Department of State, he has expressed his grateful acknowledgments for the interposition of this Government in behalf of himself and his associates. This country has been justly regarded as a safe asylum for those whom political events have exiled from their own homes in Europe; and it is recommended to Congress to consider in what manner Governor Kossuth and his companions, brought hither by its authority, shall be received and treated."

The gentleman may inquire of the President why he recommended action on the subject. I honor the President for having had the manliness and true republican independence to express his sympathy for Governor Kossuth, the champion of freedom in another hemisphere. I have very little respect, and I speak of no person here, for any American who calls himself a republican, whose coward heart does not allow him to express such sentiments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope that nothing has fallen from me in the course of the remarks which I made which indicates to anybody that I am averse to expressing sympathy for efforts in behalf of human freedom. If I said anything which could authorize an inference of that sort, I have certainly been most unfortunate in my expressions.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman stated expressly that he did not know enough of the merits of that resolution, or of the personal merits of Governor Kossuth, to justify us in any declaration of sympathy. That is what the gentleman said, and if he is properly reported he will find himself so reported. I excuse the language, because he has spoken in great haste. While up, the gentleman will allow me to say that I did not intend to apply the language which I used a moment ago to any member of the Senate. I repeat, that I have no respect for any man who calls himself a republican who is not manly enough everywhere to express his preference for republican over monarchical institutions, and his sympathy for those who are engaged in the great struggle for civil and religious freedom.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I go further than that, and say that I have no respect for any man who has not manliness and firmness enough to declare his opinions on all questions, on all occasions.

If I have been understood by any member of this body as saying that I was opposed to the expression of sympathy for the Hungarian strugglers, I have been much misunderstood. If the reporters have got me down in that way let them report it.

I could not have used such language except in the heat of debate. On the contrary, I repeatedly said that the reforms which were introduced by Kossuth and his associates deserved the highest commendation of everybody.

Mr. FOOTE. I beg to remind the gentleman of a remark which he made which wounded my sensibilities very much. He said expressly that we ought to be on our guard as to expressing commendation or approval of the acts of the Hungarian chiefs, because, in approving them, we must necessarily condemn others—alluding to certain tyrannical Governments, whose conduct I hope all Americans condemn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I endeavored, as well as I could, to show that this was an improper subject to be introduced into Congress. But I hold to the principle that, as an American freeman, I have the right to express my opinions wherever and whenever I please, in regard to the institutions of the world. I hold that the whole American people have that right, and that all ought to sympathize with the Hungarian strugglers in favor of those reforms which I understood myself as commending. The gentleman must have misunderstood me, for I could not certainly have both commended and condemned the expression of sympathy for these people.

On the motion of Mr. HALE, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 3, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.
The Journal having been read—

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution, explanatory of an act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. H. said: I simply desire to state to the House that it is the same resolution, with the amendment of the Senate, passed by the House of Representatives and the Senate last Congress, and which failed for want of time on the part of the House to concur with the Senate amendment. I think it is a resolution in which the constituents of every member are interested, and that it will receive the vote of every individual in the House.

The resolution having been read the first and second time,

The SPEAKER inquired to know what disposition the gentleman [Mr. HARRIS] desired to make of the resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. My object is to put the resolution upon its passage.

[Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"]

The resolution was read.

Mr. MEADE said: I wish to have the resolution altered so as to include warrants that were issued during the war of 1812, under an act passed, I think, that year. I have several of those old warrants, which are not assignable, having been heretofore issued. Under the new law no claimant can apply for a warrant who has heretofore received one. That class of warrants would be left unassignable under this resolution. As the policy of this resolution is to make all assignable, in order to effect that end I wish to introduce a few words in amendment. Those words are to the effect that "all other warrants issued in pursuance of laws heretofore enacted." Under the late law, the claimants under the old law of 1811 or 1812, who have not already received their warrants, can apply and receive them now.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. This is a bill for the appropriation of money, and all such bills must be first discussed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. I do not understand whether the gentleman objects to the discussion of the resolution itself, or of the amendment proposed.

Mr. STEPHENS. My objection is to any discussion of the subject at this stage of the resolution. It must go to the Committee of the Whole under the rule of the House in reference to bills appropriating money.

Mr. MEADE. This is a mere motion to make an amendment to the resolution. That can be done, and then it may be committed. I wish only that my amendment be accepted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] which I am sure he is willing to do, so as to make all warrants assignable.

Mr. STEPHENS. The rule of the House is, that there shall be no discussion of a bill making appropriations until it shall have been referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MEADE. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to accept my amendment as a part of his resolution.

The SPEAKER. I understand the resolution contains an appropriation of money. Under the rule it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand the resolution, it does not make an appropriation at all, and consequently the rule does not apply.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the Clerk read it.

The resolution was then read.

Mr. COBB. I think we can obviate the difficulty in relation to this resolution by striking out all except the first and fifth sections.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. To avoid the difficulty, I propose to strike out all except the first section: that simply construes the law so as to make the warrants assignable; and I have no objection to receive the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] the object of which is to make a different class of warrants assignable. Upon the resolution thus modified, I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee proposes now to modify this joint resolution. The resolution, according to my understanding, is now the property of the House, and it is not competent for him, on his own mere motion, to modify or change it, any more than it would be for me to do so. The resolution has been offered and received by the House; passed from his hands; read, I believe, a first and second time, and is now upon its engrossment, or proposed to be engrossed, or proposed to be passed. You must come to the conclusion, that I have just as much power over this resolution as the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] and that it is not competent for him to strike out, or add anything to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right; but the Chair has supposed that there was a general acquiescence.

Mr. JONES. I wish to call the attention of the Chair and the House to the 45th rule. After a motion is stated by the Speaker and read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment. Now, sir, I conceive my colleague has a right to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will see that the rule referred to contemplates that the mover of a proposition shall have control over it until the House passes upon it at some of its various stages. The resolution has been read the first and second time, and is now as much in the power of myself to modify it as the mover; but it is not in the power of either. It is as much my property as that of the mover of the resolution; and as such, there being a section in the bill that is material, as I conceive, to my constituents, I object to the modification unless it is done in due form. It proposes to strike out a section which I wish to retain.

Mr. JONES called for the reading of the 45th rule; and it was read, as follows:

"After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment."

Mr. JONES. When this proposition of my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] was stated by the Speaker, and read by the Clerk, it was in the possession of the House. There has been no decision upon this proposition—there have been no amendments made to it by the House; therefore it has not passed from under the control of my colleague, the mover of it; and I hold that he now has a right to withdraw it. He could withdraw it, then modify and introduce it under the notice which he has heretofore given. I think there can be no difficulty about it at all.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. My object is to make these warrants assignable, and I am not particular as to the form or mode in which it may be done. If it is competent for me to do so, I will withdraw the resolution that I have offered, change its form so as to retain the first section, and move it again in the House. I would then modify it accordingly.

Mr. JONES. With the permission of my colleague, I will say he cannot propose to amend it if it is a question of appropriation. Under the rules, it must be first considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My colleague has a right to withdraw it and present it in a modified form.

Mr. OLDS. I ask for the execution of the order in respect to the drawing of seats.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to withdraw the resolution I have offered.

Mr. BURT. I object to any further debate at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late for the gentleman to withdraw his proposition and submit it in a modified form.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

The SPEAKER. The order made yesterday in relation to the drawing of seats was postponed until half past twelve o'clock this day. The time has now arrived for the execution of the order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to state to the House that my colleague, [Mr. GILMORE,] a member from Pennsylvania, has been detained in the State of Maine by the serious illness of his wife. Under these circumstances, I wish to submit a proposition that one of his colleagues may be permitted to draw for him.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I object to that proposition.

Mr. FLORENCE. My suggestion is, that one of his colleagues from the State of Pennsylvania be permitted to draw for him.

Mr. BOCKOCK. One of my colleagues is also absent. If we go into that matter at all, we should include every absentee.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit that this is a very peculiar case, on account of the serious illness of Mr. GILMORE's wife.

Mr. BOCKOCK. There are several other gentlemen similarly situated.

The CHAIR. The execution of the order will be proceeded with.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Almost every seat here has the name of a member upon it; unless members will vacate the seats, and remain out of them until their names are drawn and a selection made, it will be almost impossible for them to know the seats that are chosen, or those which are vacant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest, in execution of the order, that when a member draws his seat, he shall take a piece of paper, paste his name upon it, and keep the seat until the whole number of seats are drawn. The Chair earnestly desires that each and every gentleman will feel it his duty to observe the rule, in regard to drawing of seats; otherwise we shall have inexplicable confusion.

The order directing the process was then read. It provided as follows:

"That the Clerk of the House place in a box the name of each member and delegate of the House of Representatives on a separate piece of paper; that he then proceed in presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said pieces of paper; and as each is drawn, he shall announce the name of the member or delegate upon it, who shall then choose his seat for the present session, provided that before said drawing shall commence, the Speaker shall cause every seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order. And inasmuch as Mr. DARY, of Missouri, is confined at his lodgings in this city by reason of sickness, one of his colleagues is authorized to select a seat for him when his name is drawn."

The House then proceeded in the execution of the order. The members left their seats, and repaired to the area in front of the Speaker's table. The names of the members, which had been placed in the box, were drawn out, consecutively, by one of the pages, until the process was thus completed and seats chosen by all the members present.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was now in order.

APPOINTMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a privileged question, connected with the organization of the House—if the House deem it necessary. I find that it has been usual to authorize the Speaker, by resolution, to appoint the standing committees of the House. I have examined the rules with a view to determine the propriety of this course, and while I have some doubts myself as to the necessity of it, I propose to follow the invariable custom of the House, and offer for adoption the usual resolution, which is in these words:

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint the standing committees of the House.

Mr. WIGHTMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois, before that resolution is acted on, to allow me to offer a resolution in reference to the printing of the President's Message.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from New Mexico, that that resolution will probably lead to a discussion. The longest discussions we have had in the House have been in relation to these very questions; sometimes they have arisen upon one resolution, and sometimes on another. The resolution I have offered is the usual one, and will doubtless be disposed of in a few moments.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WIGHTMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must first ascertain the character of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. HOUSTON. But it matters not what the proposition is. The question I desire to present is, whether it is not now the duty of the House to recur to the joint resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that being the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that that is the first business in order, and nothing can interfere with it, unless it be a question of privilege.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I understood the Chair as deciding that it was not within my power to modify the resolution which I offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decided.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Then I move to commit the resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and if the House will indulge me, I will move immediately afterwards that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken on the motion to commit the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of yesterday is now in order, being the question on the adoption of the following resolution as amended:

Resolved, That the Clerk cause to be furnished to the members of this House, during the present session, such papers as they may direct, the expense thereof not to exceed the price of three daily papers to each member, from the commencement of the session.

On this question the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. ROBBINS as amended.

Mr. TUCK. Would a motion to amend that resolution by substituting "$50" for "$30" be now in order?

The SPEAKER. No amendment would now be in order, as the resolution is under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. TUCK. Then I hope the resolution will not be adopted.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution as amended, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 139; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, W. Appleton, Averett,

Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowie, J. H. Boyd, Bragg, Briggs, Buell, Busby, Caldwell, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cottman, Dawson, Disney, Dockery, Duncan, Eastman, Edgerton, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, T. J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Goodenow, Hall, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, S. W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Henn, Houston, Hunter, Jackson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, McMullen, Meacham, Miller, Molony, Morehead, Nabers, Penn, Phelps, Porter, Robbins, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Walsh, Wells, Wilcox, and Yates—63.

YAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, D. J. Bailey, Bennett, Bocoock, Bowne, Breckenridge, Brenton, Brooks, G. H. Brown, Burrows, Burt, E. C. Cabell, J. Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Cartter, Caskie, Chapman, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dean, Dimmick, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gamble, Goodrich, Gorman, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Haws, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lotcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McNair, Meade, Millson, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penniman, Polk, Price, Rantoul, Riddle, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, R. H. Stanton, A. H. Stephens, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Toombs, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—139.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL SATURDAY.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is impossible to proceed with the business of this House to any advantage until the committees are appointed by the Presiding Officer. I intend, therefore, to move that the House do now adjourn until to-morrow, and then we can adjourn over until Monday, so as to give the Speaker an opportunity to appoint the standing committees of the House. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Illinois withdraw that motion for a few moments, to allow me to offer a resolution for the consideration of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am appealed to by several gentlemen to withdraw my motion, so as to allow them to present resolutions; and in order to give them an opportunity of so doing, I will change my motion, and now move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SEATS FOR THE OFFICIAL REPORTERS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair, to ascertain whether it be practicable to provide two or three seats within the bar of the House for the Reporters of the Congressional Globe, without incommoding the House, and that the committee report upon the subject.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. HEBARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk furnish to each member and delegate of this House, such newspapers as they may designate, the cost not exceeding $30 in the whole, to each member.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "thirty dollars," and substituting therefor "fifty dollars."

Mr. TUCK moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was on the adoption of Mr. STANTON's amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment; but they were not ordered.

Mr. FICKLIN demanded tellers on ordering the yeas and nays; but tellers were not ordered.

Mr. HALL moved to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

The SPEAKER stated that that motion, having just been voted down by the House, was not now in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 94, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON moved to lay the resolution as amended upon the table, and called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the resolution, as amended, upon the table.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Bartlett, Breckenridge, Briggs, George H. Brown, Burrows, Burt, Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Clingman, Conger, Cottman, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Duncan, Edgerton, Ewing, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Hammond, Haws, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Jenkins, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, McDonald, McNair, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Porter, Price, Riddle, Robie, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Walsh, Ward, and Washburn—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bocoock, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, Buell, Busby, Cable, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Cartter, Caskie, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Colecock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Evans, Faulkner, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ives, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lotcher, Humphrey Marshall, McLanahan, McMullen, Meacham, Millson, Molony, Murphy, Nabers, Orr, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Robinson, Skelton, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Toombs, Townsend, Venable, Walbridge, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—109.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CARTTER, the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. HENN: A bill creating three new land districts in the State of Iowa.

Also, a bill providing for the correction of errors in the location of military bounty land warrants and the entry of lands.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee: A bill to encourage agriculture and manufactures, and for other purposes.

By Mr. CLARK: A bill providing for a grant of public lands to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Du Buque to Keokuk, and from Davenport to Council Bluffs, in said State.

By Mr. LETCHER: A bill to change the times of holding the courts for the western district of Virginia, and to increase the salary of the judge thereof.

By Mr. CABELL of Florida: A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the waters of the Pensacola Bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes.

Also, a bill making a similar grant to the State of Florida, in aid of the construction of the "Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad."

By Mr. MACE: A bill granting a portion of the public lands to actual settlers.

By Mr. DOTY: A bill to select the balance of the lands to which the State of Wisconsin is entitled under the act making a grant of land to aid in the improvement of the navigation of Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and the construction of Portage canal.

Also, a bill making a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Copper Mines, on the shore of Lake Superior, to Chicago.

Also, a bill making a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from the most eligible point on Lake Michigan, to the Falls of St. Anthony, in Minnesota Territory.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Arkansas: A bill granting the right of way through, and making a grant of public lands to the State of Arkansas, in aid of the construction of a railroad from St. Louis, in Missouri, via Little Rock, to Fulton, on the Red river, and from some point on the Mississippi river, in Tennessee, via Little Rock, to Fort Smith.

By Mr. GORMAN: A bill to supply a deficiency in the grant of lands to the State of Indiana for the benefit of a State University, under the ordinance of 1787.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: A bill entitled an Act to repeal the ninth and tenth sections of the "Act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight."

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions and memorials were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. HENN: The petition of Thomas McKnight, George H. McHenry, Warner Lewis, and Mordecai Mobley, registers and receivers of the land office at Dubuque, asking additional compensation for locating military bounty land warrants.

Also, the memorial of a convention of 204 delegates from the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri, and the Territory of Minnesota, assembled at Burlington, in the State of Iowa, on the 23d and 24th days of October, 1851, asking the removal of the obstructions in the Mississippi river, at the Des Moines and Rock river Rapids.

Also, the petition of H. D. Downey and Eastin Morris, register and receiver, and Jesse Bowen, late register of the land office at Iowa City, asking additional compensation for the location of military bounty land warrants.

Also, the petition of R. W. Steele and 29 others, citizens of Warren county, Iowa, asking for the establishment of a mail route, &c., from Oskaloosa, via Knoxville and Indianola, to Winterset.

By Mr. CLARK: The petition of Thomas McKnight, M. Mobley, Warner Lewis, and George McHenry, asking additional compensation as land officers.

By Mr. CABELL of Florida: The memorial of the Board of Internal Improvements of the State of Florida for the right of way and grant of public land in said State, in aid of the construction of the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 4, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Illinois, and Mr. BADGER of North Carolina, appeared in their seats this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, made agreeably to law, communicating lists of the names of the invalids, widows, and orphans now on the Navy pension rolls of the United States; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, communicating copies of his accounts for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1850, and the first and second quarters of 1851, as adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, agreeably to law, a report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, showing the progress of that work during the year ending November, 1851; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a letter from John P. Gaines, Governor of Oregon Territory, communicating, agreeably to law, information respecting the application of moneys appropriated for public uses in that Territory; which was read.

RECESS.

Mr. BADGER. I desire this morning to seize the first vacant moment in the business of the Senate, to attend to a highly-important matter, fearing that it might be overlooked if not now attended to. I hope that my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] will give me his attention, and that on this occasion I shall be happy enough to obtain his concurrence. If I do obtain it, I have no doubt of the unanimous consent of the Senate. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WALKER. The honorable Senator who has just taken his seat has had such a very arduous and laborious duty to discharge during that portion of the session which has already elapsed, that I shall give him my concurrence in his motion to adjourn until Monday.

Mr. BADGER. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, and also, surviving officers and soldiers, and widows and children of those deceased who served in the war of 1812, for a modification of the bounty land act of September 20, 1850, so as to give to each of the persons intended to be benefited not less than one hundred and sixty acres of land.

Also, of John A. Ragan, of Louisiana, for aid to enable him to execute a plan which he has discovered to prevent the overflow of the Mississippi river, and to drain and reclaim the inundated lands of the valleys of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Mr. CHASE presented the petition of the present register and receiver, and the late incumbents of the land office at Defiance, in the State of Ohio, for additional compensation for locating military bounty land warrants.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of B. Foster Pratt, praying compensation for the services and sufferings of his father in the revolutionary war. Laid on the table.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. CLEMENS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Selma to the Tennessee river;

A bill granting a right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Chattanooga to Memphis;

A joint resolution conferring on Major General Winfield Scott the brevet rank of Lieutenant General; and

A bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Girard to Mobile Bay.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the President of the United States to equip and dispatch suitable vessels, with competent officers, to explore and examine that portion of the North Pacific Ocean embraced in the route and course to and from China and Japan, the Philippine Islands, &c., with the view to facilitate commercial intercourse.

Mr. FISH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a Mint of the United States in the city of New York.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were severally read a first time and ordered to a second reading:

A bill to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California which were collected in the ports of said State as a revenue upon imports since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and prior to the admission of said State into the Union;

A bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States in the State of California;

A bill to provide for the survey of the public lands in California, the granting of donation privileges thereon, and for other purposes; and

A bill to create a Board of Commissioners for the examination and payment of claims against the United States growing out of the conquest of California.

Mr. GEYER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the State of Missouri, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from the city of St. Louis to the western limits of said State; which was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MORTON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of lands to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola Bay, in the State of Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution explanatory of the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States;" which was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

THE IRISH PATRIOTS.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien, Thos. F. Meagher, and their associates; which was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I gave notice the other day, although it was not necessary according to our rules, of a resolution in relation to the compromise measures, so called. I now introduce the resolution. I wish it to be read.

[The resolution was read as published on page 21.]

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I hope the Senate will bear with me while I make a single remark, which is this: I expect to leave this place on the 20th day of this month. I am exceedingly anxious to carry such a resolution as this home with me, for various reasons which I need not state. It is the only favor which I shall ask of the Senate during the present session, and I trust that no opposition will be made to my motion to take it up now for consideration, with the view of making it the special order of the day for Monday next, at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks for the consideration of the resolution at this time. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CHASE. Then I object to it, because I think this resolution should not take precedence of the important business which has been already brought to the notice of the Senate.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I feel very much flattered that the opposition comes from that quarter, and I hope it will be continued. We mean to put it down.

Mr. CHASE. It will undoubtedly be continued.

INTEROCEANIC SHIP CANAL.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following, which lies over under the rule:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a dispatch addressed by Mr. Niles, late American Chargé d'Affaires to Sardinia, to the Hon. John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, on the subject of a ship channel to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, having date 30th June, 1849, in his opinion such communication can be made without injury to the public interest.

COAST SURVEY.

Mr. PEARCE. It has been usual, I believe, to order an extra number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey to be printed for the use of the Senate. I submit an order on that subject, which will, I suppose, go to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That five thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the accompanying report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that five hundred copies of this number be supplied to the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition will go to the Committee on Printing.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which lies over under the rule:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to inform the Senate if the Navy Department has been informed of any violations of the law of the United States abolishing flogging in the naval service, by any officers of the Navy; and if so, what measures, if any, has the Secretary taken to vindicate the law.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. CHASE. I move that the bill which I introduced the other day, to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in said State, be now taken up for consideration, so that it may be ordered to be printed.

Mr. ATCHISON. I do not know that I shall have any objection to the gentleman's bill; but I can see no reason why it should now be printed. It will be referred, of course, to the Committee on Public Lands when the committee shall have been organized. When bills are reported by committees, I believe, under our rules, they are printed for the use of the Senate, without any motion for that purpose. If this bill be now printed before its reference, when it shall have been reported it will be reprinted, and then we shall have the same bill printed twice, at a double cost. I hope that the Senator will withdraw his motion, for I can see no good object to be advanced by it.

Mr. CHASE. I hope the honorable Senator from Missouri will withdraw the opposition which he makes to the motion, when he understands the precise state of the facts. This bill was reported at the last session of Congress by the Committee on Public Lands. There now remains in the State of Ohio only something less than three hundred thousand acres of land, and that chiefly worthless, which it is proposed by this bill to cede to the State. It was drawn up at the Land Office, and has all the guards which that bureau thought fit to impose upon it. Under these circumstances, having come from a committee of this body, having had the sanction of one of the Departments, I hope that it will be permitted to be printed, as several bills have already been. I trust that the printing of it will not again become necessary, but that printing it now will, in point of fact, facilitate its consideration.

Mr. ATCHISON. I would state to the Senate, that what I said was more a matter of suggestion to the Senator from Ohio than opposition on my part to the measure, as he seems to understand it. I withdraw all opposition to the motion.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Can a single member successfully oppose this proposition?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. The proposition is simply a motion to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. FOOTE. The question, then, is: whether there is any opposition. I think the Senator from Ohio at this moment desires this as a favor from the Senate. As I am not in the habit of returning evil for evil, and especially as I do not wish to return illiberality for illiberality, I shall very gladly embrace the opportunity of voting for the proposition.

The motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I am about to submit a motion for the printing of the bill. But before I do so, I wish to say a word in response to the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I think the Senate will bear me witness, that during the whole period of my service in this body, I have never been wanting in liberality to my brother Senators. And if I have objected to the consideration at this time of the resolution of the honorable Senator, it was from a deference to the public interests, and not from any personal illiberality towards him.

Mr. FOOTE. I am sure, from the language of the honorable Senator, that he could not have heard my application to the Senate. I stated that I should leave this city, and leave my seat here vacant, on the 20th of this month, and I had only one favor to ask of the members of this body during the present session, and that was, the simple favor of allowing the resolution which I have introduced, and which I hope will not cause any serious debate, to be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock. I did not suppose any member would refuse such a favor. I merely explain this, that it may be understood how the thing stands. If the gentleman thinks that he is really entitled to commendation for his liberal disposition, I hope he will presently withdraw his opposition to that request.

Mr. CHASE. I move that the bill be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I now propose to renew the motion which I made some time ago. The honorable Senator from Ohio did not, as I supposed, hear the statement which I made explanatory of the reasons why I wished the resolution in regard to the compromise measures to be taken up; and he has been courteous enough to withdraw his objection. I hope no opposition will be made in any quarter to have that resolution considered at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; when,

On motion of Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, its further consideration was postponed till Monday, at one o'clock, and it was made the special order for that time.

RECEPTION AND ENTERTAINMENT OF KOSUTH.

Mr. HALE. I call for the order of the day. The PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday, being the joint resolution to provide for the reception and entertainment of Louis Kosuth, Governor of Hungary, in the United States, is now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. HALE. Was not twelve and a half o'clock to-day assigned for the election of a Chaplain?

The PRESIDENT. No such assignment was made.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I wish to ask leave to withdraw the resolution now before the Senate. I will simply state in relation to the matter, that inasmuch as I find opposition to this resolution coming from an unexpected quarter, and as

I am not willing that the time of the Senate shall be occupied with a long discussion on the subject, and especially as the resolution, if not acted upon by both Houses immediately, can do no good, with the consent of the Senate I would like to withdraw it, and leave the Governor of Hungary to the Administration and the people, for they will deal with him most liberally.

Leave being granted, the resolution was withdrawn.

Mr. SEWARD. I give notice that I will at some early day ask leave to introduce a joint resolution declaring that the Congress of the United States, in the name and in behalf of the people, give to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and to the country.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States, in the name and behalf of the people of the United States, give Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and to the country.

ELECTION OF A CHAPLAIN.

Mr. HALE. I move that we now proceed to elect a Chaplain.

Mr. BADGER. Is it in order to move to proceed to the election of a Chaplain before the adoption of a resolution declaring that a Chaplain shall be elected?

The PRESIDENT. The usual mode has been to introduce a resolution for the election of a Chaplain, and then to designate the period when he shall be elected. In this case a simple motion was adopted to elect a Chaplain at one o'clock yesterday. That hour was passed over in consequence of the Senate being engaged in other business, and the Chair could not execute the order.

Mr. HALE. Then I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That two Chaplains be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose that resolution lies over?

The PRESIDENT. It lies over as a matter of course, unless the Senate chooses, by a unanimous consent, to take it up.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 6, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. The Journal of Wednesday having been read,

Mr. POLK said he found that his name had not been recorded in the final vote on the resolution to provide newspapers for the members. He was present on that occasion, and had voted against the resolution. He desired that the Journal might be so corrected.

There was no objection, and the Journal was ordered to be corrected accordingly.

The Journal was then approved.

The following members appeared to-day, were qualified, and took their seats, viz: Messrs. JOHN H. BOYD, of New York; JAMES M. H. BEALE, of Virginia; ALEXANDER WHITE, of Alabama; LOUIS ST. MARTIN and J. ARTISTIDE LANDRY, of Louisiana; WM. H. BISSELL, of Illinois; and VOLNEY E. HOWARD, of Texas.

Mr. COBB said: I hold in my hand a bill, which I will send to the Speaker's desk, of which I have given previous notice. And I desire to give notice to the House, that when it shall have been read I will move that it be put upon its passage. It is simple in its bearings, and if the House will give me its ear for a moment until it is read, I think there will be no difficulty in its passage.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] indulge the Chair while he presents some communications from the Departments?

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, communicating copies of his accounts for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1850, and the first and second quarters of 1851, as adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, agreeably to law, a report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, showing the progress of that work during the year ending November, 1851.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the communication from the Treasury Department be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. There is no such committee to which it can be referred. I move to lay the communication upon the table, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS. I wish to make a motion as to one of the communications upon the table—the report from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey. I desire to move that it be laid upon the table and printed, and that ten thousand extra copies be printed, five thousand of which to be at the disposal of the Coast Survey Bureau. It is the usual number of extra copies, and this report is still more valuable than any preceding one on this subject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am opposed to that motion, and shall move, when the committees are appointed, that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, to report upon the propriety of printing the extra numbers. That is a matter which ought to be inquired into. I have no objections to its being ordered to be printed; but as to the printing of any extra copies I do object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire how this subject was brought before the House?

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. EVANS. I believe it has been customary in former years to print extra numbers of this document.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] that the rule requires all propositions for printing extra numbers to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman is mistaken. That is the rule only respecting the President's message and accompanying documents. If the gentleman will examine the rule he will see how it is, and that it does not apply to the printing of this document.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I know it has been usual to print an extra number of copies of this report, but I have never been satisfied that it is proper to do so, and I am less satisfied now than I have heretofore been; and until there has been a report of a committee upon the propriety of so doing, I shall oppose the printing of extra copies. It is attended with immense expense, and with but little or no profit.

Mr. EVANS. I will occupy the attention of the House, in regard to this matter, but a few moments. There is perhaps no document which emanates from the Government in greater demand or of higher importance than this. Commercial men everywhere—not only here, but over the whole globe—send for copies of the Coast Survey; and we have had more calls for it, from every part of the world—from North and South America, from Europe, Asia, and Africa—than we have ever been able to supply. I will show to the honorable gentleman [Mr. STEPHENS] the importance of this document and the reasons why there should be no delay in the printing of it. As I stated a little while ago, there is in this document more than three thousand two hundred geographical posts, for the first time, ascertained with entire accuracy—posts of the highest importance to commerce and to the navy; the latitude and longitude of important points on the coast, and concerning which it is highly desirable that information should be given at once to commercial men everywhere. Now, if this were a new motion, on a new subject, it might be important that it should be examined by a committee. But it has been examined by the Committee on Printing, in former Congresses, from time to time and from year to year, and an extra number has always been ordered. We have the concurrence of all former Printing Committees to which this subject has ever been referred, in favor of printing extra numbers. I am not in favor of incurring extra and unnecessary expense; but this document is in great demand, and continual calls are made upon the Department and upon members of the House for it. It contains much information in regard to light-houses and their posts. It contains also the leading lines, and sailing lines, and directions for the most important parts of the coast—as I said before, the latitude and longitude of a vast number of places highly important to the sailing part of the world.

I ask no deviation from the ordinary course. It has always been usual, when that document has come here and been laid upon the table, to print it, and then to print the usual extra numbers, of which the Department has had the control of a certain part of them.

I cannot imagine why the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] should oppose it. He opposes it because of its extravagance. He cannot oppose it because of its impropriety; for, of the vast number of printed documents that emanate from this House, this is one of the very few useful ones, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his opposition to printing extra numbers of it.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not attach the importance to this matter of printing extra copies of this document which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] seems to attach to it. I represent the Chesapeake Bay, in part, and nearly all the sea-coast of Virginia. The importance of this coast-survey cannot well be overated, but you cannot supply the whole demand for it by any number of copies that you will print. The great importance of it consists in its going into the hands of the chartmakers, for from this coast-survey they make out their charts, which are kept regularly for sale in all the cities and towns in the United States; and vessel-owners can supply themselves.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. This proposition to print extra numbers of this document must, of necessity, be referred to the Committee on Printing, in accordance with the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, passed in 1846. I ask that the first clause of the 3d section of that resolution be read.

It was accordingly read, as follows:

"That all motions to print extra numbers of any bill, paper, or document, in either House, shall be referred to the Committee on Printing of that House, who shall report on the propriety of printing, and the probable expense thereof, as early as convenient."

Mr. HOUSTON. I was about to rise to the same point. I have also here a copy of the Journal of the Thirty-first Congress, and I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] to it. It says, "Mr. Winthrop moved that four thousand copies of the report 'on the coast-survey be printed, which motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.'" It seems, therefore, that in corroboration of this construction of the rules of the House, its practice has been to refer such motions to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn till Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained while the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] has possession of the floor.

Mr. BAYLY. I had nearly concluded my remarks.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The motion before the House is not in order.

Mr. EVANS. I call for the reading of the 61st rule.

The rule was then read, as follows:

"A proposition requesting information of the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of either of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General, or to print an extra number of any document or other matter, excepting the messages of the President to both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in it, shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be taken up for consideration in the order in which they were presented, immediately after reports are called for from select committees; and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be delivered."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take occasion to remark, that there seems to be some conflict between the rule of the House and the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress. The Chair is aware that extra numbers of the President's messages and accompanying documents have been printed at the beginning of each Congress—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (interrupting the Chair,) said: If the Chair will allow me, the part of the 61st rule to which reference has been made, has regard solely to the old rule of the House which required that all motions to print extra numbers of any document shall lie upon the table one day. In 1846 a joint resolution was passed requiring that motions to print extra numbers of any document shall go to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that, under the rule of the House, the motion must lie over.

The motion can be entered, but not acted upon. Mr. EVANS. Then I shall not press the matter further. I submit the motion that ten thousand extra copies be printed; and, according to the decision of the Chair, the motion will lie over.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire, before this matter has passed from before the House, to suggest to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] whether it would not be better to order the usual number of copies to be printed now, and let the extra numbers lie over? I think it is better to take that course, and by the time the usual number are printed we can dispose of the extras.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama make a motion?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir. I move that the report do lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS. The Chair does not comprehend the point I suggested. "A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of either of the executive departments, or by the Postmaster General," &c. That was the old rule. The amended rule then goes on to say: "or to print an extra number of any document, or other matter, excepting messages of the President to both Houses, at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with, or referred to in it," &c. The joint rule passed in 1846, requires that these documents shall be referred to the Committee on Printing. This is the rule that is to apply in this case; because this document, having been referred to in the President's message, forms one of the exceptions, and hence does not go over.

Mr. EVANS. I would suggest, that by general consent, this motion to print ten thousand extra copies be referred to the Committee on Printing when that committee shall have been appointed. I am perfectly willing that disposition should be made of it.

[Cries of "No objection!" "No objection!"]

Mr. EVANS continued. I will say just one word to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] in relation to his suggestion, that the House first order the usual number of copies to be printed, and leave the extras to be disposed of afterwards. That gentleman will see that if we adopt his suggestion, and the House at some subsequent time order the extra number of copies to be printed, the type will have to be reset. Suppose we order the usual number of copies to be printed now, and the committee delay to report for some days: the type will have to be set up again, and we shall be put to double the expense.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is supposing the committee will not do its duty. I am perfectly willing, however, that the motion shall go to the Committee on Printing.

The question was then taken, and the report was ordered to be laid upon the table.

It was then, by general consent, referred to the Committee on Printing, when appointed.

Mr. COBB. I now ask that the bill I sent to the Clerk's desk be read, and that it be put upon its passage. The necessity of its immediate passage will appear upon its face, and I trust there will not be a man upon this floor to oppose it.

The SPEAKER said it required the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. CARTER objected.

Mr. COBB asked if it would be in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER replied in the negative, it not being in order to suspend the rules except on Mondays.

Mr. COBB. I see the House is not in a state for action to-day. I withdraw my motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next, to afford time to the Speaker to arrange the committees.

[Cries of "No, no! let's meet on Monday."]

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 117, noes not counted.

The question then recurred upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER asked that the motion be withdrawn, in order to allow him to present an application to withdraw certain papers.

Mr. STEPHENS refused to withdraw.

The question was then taken, and The House adjourned till Tuesday next.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. WALSH: A supplement to the act of September 28th, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," empowering the heirs at law of deceased officers and soldiers who held in their lifetime certificates not located, to locate the same in their own names.

Also, a bill making the counterfeiting of bounty land certificates and other instruments of value, a criminal offense.

By Mr. STROTHER: A bill for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company.

By Mr. COBB: A bill for the relief of W. J. Price, of the county of Jackson, in the State of Alabama.

By Mr. TAYLOR: A bill further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOWNE: The petition of Thomas B. Cottrill, for compensation for damages sustained by seizure of the schooner Essex by the Mexican Government; and the petition of Edward Quinn, for increase of pension.

By Mr. TAYLOR: The petition of H. J. D. Bruin and 43 others, citizens of Adams county, Ohio, praying Congress to relieve Lindsay Gossett, as one of the securities of Isaac Grutzman, late postmaster at Scott, in Adams county, Ohio.

By Mr. CABELL of Florida: The petition of Antonio Alvarez, for arrears of pay as keeper of the archives at St. Augustine.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 8, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The following Senators, in addition to those who appeared last week, took their seats this morning:

Mr. RUSK, from Texas; Mr. BELL, from Tennessee; Mr. BUTLER and Mr. RHETT, from South Carolina; Mr. DOWNS, from Louisiana; Mr. BORLAND, from Arkansas.

COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. President, I believe the business of the Senate will be promoted by the appointment of our standing committees, which will supersede the necessity of laying business on the table, and hereafter again taking it up for reference. I therefore move that the 35th rule of the Senate be suspended, and that the gentlemen whose names will be found in the list which I send to the Chair, constitute the committees of the Senate for the present Congress. The 35th rule provides that the election of chairmen and members of the committees shall be by ballot. I understand, however, that time can be saved and much trouble obviated. By the unanimous consent of the Senate the rule can be waived, and I hope, by general concurrence, the list which I send up will be adopted.

There being no objection, the rule was suspended, and the following were agreed to as the committees of the Senate for the present Congress:

On Foreign Relations—Messrs. Mason, Douglas, Norris, Mangum, Underwood.

On Finance—Messrs. Hunter, Bright, Gwin, Pearce, Miller.

On Commerce—Messrs. Hamlin, Soule, Dodge of Wisconsin, Davis, Seward.

On Manufactures—Messrs. Sebastian, Bayard, Stockton, Upham, James.

On Agriculture—Messrs. Soule, Walker, Atchison, Spruance, Wade.

On Military Affairs—Messrs. Shields, Clemens, Borland, Dawson, Jones of Tennessee.

On the Militia—Messrs. Houston, Dodge of Wisconsin, Borland, Morton, Spruance.

On Naval Affairs—Messrs. Gwin, Stockton, Mallory, Badger, Fish.

On Public Lands—Messrs. Felch, Shields, Dodge of Iowa, Underwood, Pratt.

On Private Land Claims—Messrs. Downs, Whitcomb, Clemens, Davis, Hale.

On Indian Affairs—Messrs. Atchison, Sebastian, Rusk, Bell, Cooper.

Of Claims—Messrs. Brodhead, Whitcomb, Bayard, Pratt, Wade.

On Revolutionary Claims—Messrs. Walker, Chase, James, Foot of Vermont, Sumner.

On the Judiciary—Messrs. Butler, Downs, Bradbury, Berrien, Geyer.

On Post Roads—Messrs. Rusk, Soule, Hamlin, Upham, Morton.

On Roads and Canals—Messrs. Bright, Rhett, Douglas, Spruance, Sumner.

On Pensions—Messrs. Jones of Tennessee, Borland, Stockton, Foot of Vermont, Geyer.

On Patents and the Patent Office—Messrs. Norris, James, Whitcomb, Dawson, Smith.

On Retrenchment—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Felch, Mangum, Fish.

On Territories—Messrs. Douglas, Houston, Gwin, Cooper, Jones of Tennessee.

On Public Buildings—Messrs. Whitcomb, Hunter, Clarke.

On Printing—Messrs. Borland, Hamlin, Smith.

On Engrossed Bills—Messrs. Bayard, Mallory, Hale.

On the Library—Messrs. Pearce, Clemens, Dodge of Iowa.

On Enrolled Bills—Messrs. Jones of Iowa, Badger.

To Audit and Control the contingent Expenses of the Senate—Messrs. Dodge of Iowa, Walker, Bell.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented numerous petitions from the States of Missouri, Indiana, Vermont, Illinois, Alabama, Delaware, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. All the memorialists, he said, represent that they are grieved by the election of Chaplains to serve in the Congress of the United States; and they are further grieved, they say, by the appointment of Chaplains in the land and naval forces of the United States; they therefore beg that the subject may be taken into consideration by the Senate, and steps adopted to get clear of these obnoxious appointments to them. I move that they be received, and for the present laid upon the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Sarah Bennet, widow of Asahel Bennet, asking compensation for his services during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, of Gen. Hugh W. Dobbin, asking compensation for his services as an officer in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, of Hugh W. Page and other officers of the Navy, asking compensation in consideration of peculiar hardships and increased expenses to which they were subject while in California; and of the petty officers, seamen, and marines who served in the frigate Savannah during her cruise in the Pacific in 1849, asking additional pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BADGER presented the memorial of the President and Directors of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company, asking a remission of the duties on certain railroad iron; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California in relation to the Peon fund; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, in favor of an act of Congress refunding to the State the duties collected in her ports previous to her admission into the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Also, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their best efforts to procure the establishment of forts and the placing of troops along the borders of this State for the protection of the citizens against Indian incursions; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of E. D. Reynolds, a Purser in the Navy, asking compensation for his services as a naval storekeeper at San Francisco, and to be allowed the pay of a Purser to a sloop-of-war for the time he performed the duties; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, from W. Henderlite, asking compensation for services in carrying the mail; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1851.

NEW SERIES....No. 3.

Mr. DAVIS. I am requested to present the petition of William Cranch, Chief Justice of the District of Columbia, who represents that by an act passed March 3, 1839, the duty of hearing appeals from the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents was imposed on him as the Chief Justice of this District. From that time forward he has attended to this service, but by reason of his age and infirmities, he does not feel able at this time to discharge that additional duty, and he prays that he may be relieved from it by a modification of the law. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

While I am up I beg leave to add a word more. This venerable gentleman, respected by all who know him, and who is a very competent man for the station which he occupies, has, during this period, for the compensation of $100, heard a great number of these appeals. That moderate compensation was put in the bill changing the mode of hearing the various questions that were raised by applicants for patents for inventions, and this compensation was fixed without knowing what was the extent of the duty. I have reason to think that the compensation is very inadequate. I hope that will be taken into consideration.

The memorial was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DAVIS also presented the memorial of Winthrop Coffin, and Howard, Son & Co., proposing to establish a line of steamers between Boston and New Orleans, and asking that they may be authorized to contract for carrying the mails between those ports; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS presented the memorial of the police justices of the parish of Morehouse, Louisiana, asking a confirmation of the title of this parish to certain lands lying on the Bastrop grant; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, one of John Erwin, a settler on the Bastrop grant, asking to be allowed a section of land in lieu of what he had been dispossessed of by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, one of Thomas J. Durant, asking payment of a balance due him on a settlement of his accounts, and that he may be authorized to institute a suit against the United States, for the purpose of obtaining a judicial decision of his claim; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States frigate Savannah, asking additional payment for services in California; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLER presented the memorial of citizens of Newark, New Jersey, asking the enactment of a law giving further remedies for patentees; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CASS presented the memorial of Hezekiah Miller, a clerk in the Indian Bureau, asking to be allowed certain arrears of pay.

Also, of certain Hollanders, settlers in the counties of Ottawa and Allegan, in the State of Michigan, asking an appropriation for the improvement of Black Lake Harbor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, of David P. Weeks, a pensioner of the United States, asking to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of James Jeffries and P. M. Smith, asking to be released from a forfeiture incurred under a contract for carrying the mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of the late and present receiver of the land office at Dubuque, Iowa, asking additional compensation for services in locating military bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of Taverner, McKay, and others, of Carson Valley, California, representing that they had discovered a new route to California; but that, as it was disturbed by Indians, they proposed to protect emigrants on that route, for which service they ask that a tract of land may be ceded to them. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On the motion of Mr. SEWARD, the petition of Stephen Warren, which he presented last week, was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On the motion of Mr. CHASE, the petition of the land officers at Defiance, Ohio, which he presented a few days ago, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to allow exchanges of and granting additional school lands to the State of Arkansas;

A bill to amend the laws on the subject of the inspection of steamboats, &c.;

A bill for the relief of the widow of General Worth; and

A bill for the relief of Mark and Richard Bean.

Mr. FELCH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in said State;

A bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the purpose of constructing a road from Saginaw to Montreat river, with a branch from the Grand river into the same; and

A bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Michigan for saline purposes.

Mr. RHETT gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to indemnify the State of South Carolina for money expended for the United States in the war in Florida with the Seminole Indians.

Mr. MORTON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. A. M. Dade, widow of the late Major F. L. Dade, United States Army.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for extending the laws and the judicial system of the United States to the State of California," passed 28th September, 1850.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad from Selma to the Tennessee river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to confer the title of Lieutenant General by brevet for eminent services; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GWIN, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a navy-yard and depot on the Bay of San Francisco; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution, explanatory of the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act giving bounty land warrants to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States;" which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill to cede the public lands of the United States to the States respectively in which they lie situated, on condition that the said States shall severally grant and convey the said lands to actual occupants only, in limited quantities for cost of survey, transfer, and title muniments merely;

A bill granting to the State of Wisconsin the right of way and a donation of the public lands for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Milwaukee to Prairie la Crosse, in Wisconsin; and

A bill granting to the State of Wisconsin the right of way and a donation of the public lands, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Fond du Lac to Janesville.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice that he would move to amend the rules of the Senate as follows:

The Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Doorkeeper, and Assistant Doorkeeper, shall be chosen on the third Monday of the present Congress, and on the second Monday of the first session of every succeeding Congress.

BILLS REFERRED.

All the bills laid on the table during the present session, were taken up and appropriately referred.

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED.

Mr. DAVIS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to complete the sets of statutes of the United States in use in the Senate, its offices, and Committee rooms, by adding thereto the 9th volume.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. HALE a few days since, respecting violations of the law abolishing flogging in the Navy, came up for consideration.

Mr. HALE. I wish to move to lay that resolution on the table for the present, for the reason that I am not certain whether the abuse to which the resolution refers occurred before or subsequent to the passage of the act.

The motion was agreed to.

INTER-OCEANIC CANAL.

The following resolution was taken from the table and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate a dispatch addressed by Mr. Niles, late American Chargé d'Affaires to Sardinia, to the Hon. John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, on the subject of a ship canal to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, having date 30th June, 1859, if in his opinion such communication can be made without injury to the public interest.

CHAPLAINS TO CONGRESS.

The following resolution was also taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That two Chaplains be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

Mr. SEWARD, pursuant to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States, in the name and behalf of the people of the United States, give to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and to the country; and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to him by the President of the United States.

The resolution was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask that it may now have its second reading.

Mr. CLEMENS. Let it lie over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I give notice that when this resolution comes up for consideration I shall move to substitute for it the resolution which was withdrawn the other day by the Senator from Mississippi. I ask that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. It will be laid upon the table informally.

Mr. SEWARD. I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois to move that both the resolution and the amendment be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait on Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, and introduce him to the Senate.

That, Mr. President, may supply the place of the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.] This is precisely according to the precedent in the case of Lafayette. As I understand the matter, on that occasion the joint committee, which had been appointed to receive him, reported that it was impossible for the two Houses to receive him by joint action; and each branch of Congress received Lafayette in its own way, this body receiving him in the manner which I propose by this resolution that we shall receive Kossuth.

I hope there will be no objection to considering this resolution at this time. Louis Kossuth is now amongst us. He is the guest of the country. Here he is at your door; and, as was said by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] the other day, it would seem very strange that we should turn our backs upon a distinguished man whom we have invited here. He was invited by the nation. He is the guest of the nation in some measure, and I can see no impropriety in receiving him in this simple manner. The resolution merely provides that he shall be introduced to the Senate, in the same manner that Lafayette was.

I do not know whether I am transgressing the rules of the Senate in making these remarks at present. Perhaps I am; but there is one thing more which I wish to mention. If this distinguished man shall be received at all—if we perform this act of courtesy, it ought to be performed with something like a good grace. It is merely an act of courtesy, of high national courtesy; and if performed at all, it should be performed in the spirit of courtesy.

I have heard objections to receiving this distinguished man from honorable Senators whom I esteem very highly—from my friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and others. Why, if Louis Kossuth ever goes to Kentucky, my word for it, he never received a more enthusiastic welcome than he will receive in that generous old State. Sir, if there is a place on earth where an exiled and unfortunate man would be received warmly, enthusiastically, and nobly, it is in that State. Take New Hampshire; would it not be the same there? Take Georgia; would it not be the same there? Yet, we are told that as there are other foreign exiles besides Kossuth, this would be setting a bad example, and, therefore, this honor ought to be refused. I can scarcely think the term "foreign exile" ought to be a name of reproach in the United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair very unwillingly interferes with the honorable Senator; but the first question is on considering the resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Chair will permit me, I will terminate these irregular remarks by a single statement.

The world is now looking to the action of this body and this Congress. The prayers of Hungary follow this man. The hopes of the liberal party in Europe follow him. In my humble opinion, he is the great man of this day. I feel that if there is one man who will carry out, what I hope will be carried out, the concentration of the moral force of this age against despotism, that man is Louis Kossuth. I think that is his mission—not to involve us in war, not to force us into intervention, but to combine, unite, and concentrate the moral force of the civilized world against the power of the oppression of the world. If we are to receive him at all, what can be more simple than that three Senators should take Louis Kossuth by the hand and introduce him to the Senate of the United States, that we may hear what he has to say for his country and his cause? Let us hear him, at any rate. How are we to hear him? How is the Senate to receive him? I do not propose giving Louis Kossuth a governmental reception. What I propose is a mere act of courtesy, a mere honor to be paid to the representative of one of the oldest nationalities in the world—a nation that defended Christianity before this Union had an existence.

I regret that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. POORE] the other day withdrew his resolution. I feel, I know that every act of the Senate of the United States is weighed, and poised, and considered in every part of the civilized world. Although there is no one here who objects to Louis Kossuth, yet the withdrawal of such a resolution, the defeat of such a proposition, goes forth to the world as if the United States invited a man to the country, sent a national ship to bring him to the country, and then refused to give him the compliment of a reception.

I have, in conclusion, to entreat the Senate to consider this resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate to make a few remarks, on account of the personal application, perhaps, to myself of some of the remarks of my friend from Illinois. It might be inferred from what he said, that I have intimated an indisposition to receive Louis Kossuth, and give him, as an individual, the hand of commendation. My object in rising is to state, that as an individual, as a man, no one, here or elsewhere, will receive Mr. Kossuth with more heartfelt admiration than myself; and I will venture to say for the people I represent, that if he should visit Kentucky, my constituency would receive him not only with that courtesy which belongs to a distinguished foreigner, but with that admiration and sympathy which they believe is due to a man indoctrinated with the same principles of liberty which they themselves possess. But in the remarks which I made the other day, I endeavored to draw a distinction between what we ought to do individually as men, and what this Government ought to do as a Government, and this Congress ought to do as a Congress. I endeavored then to show that this was a subject, in all its relations, in all its bearings, which ought not to be introduced into the Congress of the United States. I think so still. I have made these remarks to put myself right in reference to the matter suggested by my friend from Illinois. I think he is altogether mistaken as to Kossuth's having been invited to come to this country; but that is a question which will come up when this resolution shall be before us for consideration. I do not think we ought to consider it now. Let the resolution take the usual course.

The PRESIDENT. Then the resolution will lie over.

ABD-EL-KADER.

Mr. HALE gave notice that to-morrow, or some subsequent day of the session, he will ask leave to introduce a joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to cause a correspondence to be opened with the President of the French Republic, the object of which shall be to interpose the friendly offices of the Government of the United States with that Government in behalf of the liberation of Abd-el-Kader.

CENSUS PRINTING.

Mr. BRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the printing of the returns of the seventh census.

It was read a first and second time.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BORLAND. I must object to referring this proposition to the Committee on Printing. I can see no necessity for a reference. This is not a subject involving the public printing. It is a question as to policy, of which I think the Senate is the proper judge.

Mr. BRIGHT. I know of no committee of this body so appropriate as the Committee on Printing, to take charge of and report upon the joint resolution just read, and which I have offered with a full knowledge of the importance of having prompt action thereon.

This printing ought to have been performed during the recess of Congress, and, but for the confused condition of this branch of the public service, would now have been on our tables. There is a necessity for legislation before this work can be done. I have named the individuals proposed to be contracted with, in order that the Committee on Printing, or any other committee the Senate may think proper to refer the joint resolution to, may ascertain their ability to go on with the work immediately, for delay lessens the value of the service to be performed in this case. I think the Committee on Printing is the more appropriate one, and hope the Senate will so direct.

The motion to refer to the Committee on Printing was agreed to.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE of Mississippi, which he amended by substituting the words "faithfully observed," for the word "respected," in the last line; so that it stands as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery, and as such, that said measures should be acquiesced in and faithfully observed by all good citizens.

Mr. FOOTE of Mississippi. When I made up my mind to introduce the resolution now under consideration, I did not expect to say anything in explanation of it. The phraseology in which it is couched is neither mysterious nor equivocal, and therefore I had cherished the hope that its immediate adoption by this body would take place, without any extended discussion upon the delicate questions involved therein. I trust still, most confidently, that no excited or angry debate will arise on this resolution, either here or elsewhere, and that the two Houses of Congress, by uniting promptly and cordially in the solemn declaration which has now been twice made by the President of the United States, that he considers the series of measures recognized as constituting the plan of adjustment—"as a final settlement, in principle and substance, of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced"—will do their part in securing an early restoration of the friendly and fraternal relations formerly existing between the different sections of this Confederacy, and thus aid, as far as it is in their power to do so, in the suppression of a dangerous and unseemly agitation, the former progress of which undoubtedly placed the institutions of the country in extreme peril, and involved the Republic itself in more or less of discredit. In departing from my original intention, and undertaking to address the Senate very briefly at the present time, my object is simply to prevent any misunderstanding touching my own motives, and counteracting certain misrepresentations in regard thereto, which I discover already to have been made.

Mr. President, I cannot believe that there are many individuals in this body, who are prepared to declare their disapproval of the conduct of the President in twice deliberately and formally arraying all the influence of eminent station and high character in favor of a scheme of pacification and settlement which had previously received the approval of the two Houses of Congress, and to which he had also imparted his own official sanction; but to which he was at the time aware that opposition of a serious and imposing character had been presented in different forms, and in opposite sections of the Republic. What was right in itself, and worthy of approbation in the President, will be equally proper on the part of Congress; and I am prepared to show, that still stronger reasons exist for such action as is proposed by this resolution than could be supposed legitimately to influence the mind of the Executive. The legislation of Congress upon the questions involved in the series of measures referred to in the resolution, was unfortunately in its progress surrounded by circumstances of a nature calculated to awaken more or less of doubt in regard to the real intentions and feelings of those who participated therein; and movements have subsequently occurred, not necessary here to be specified, which have called into existence in the minds of the friends of the Union grave apprehensions as to the intention of those who were originally opposed to the measures of compromise to defeat, or at least seriously obstruct, the faithful execution of the same now and hereafter. The number of those thus opposed to these measures, it must be acknowledged, was in the beginning by no means contemptible, and that number I fear has not so much diminished of late as many over-sanguine persons imagine. It is undeniable that armed opposition to a certain portion of these measures has occurred in more than one instance in particular vicinages, easy to be mentioned; and it is equally certain that substantial resistance to other portions of this plan of settlement has been quite as extensively contemplated elsewhere. Sectional jealousies, which have existed now for many years past, are not yet as fully assuaged as all true patriots desire they should be. Factional politicians have been industriously at work in various States of the Confederacy, to inflame the popular mind of the country and to give perpetuity to that unfortunate misunderstanding which has so long continued between good men north and south of a certain geographical line. Great and persevering efforts have been made in the free States of the North by a certain class of political agitators, to array public feeling against the act for the restoration of fugitives from service, and scenes have occurred under such deplorable instigation of too ferocious and bloody a character to be more than alluded to on such an occasion as the present. Movements equally deplorable, in my judgment, have occurred in several of the Southern States of the Union, the tendency of which has been, to a considerable extent, to establish relations of permanent hostility between the people of the North and of the South. Belonging to that class of politicians who have uniformly looked to the measures of adjustment as constituting, unitedly, an equitable scheme of settlement, I have entertained a confident hope that they would ultimately receive a fair appreciation as such at the hands of my countrymen whether resident north or south of Mason and Dixon's line; and I rejoice in believing that the people of the Union, apart from the selfish politicians who have been so ardently struggling to delude them, are every day growing better and better satisfied with these measures. Still there is something for Congress to do, in order to reconcile more thoroughly the sectional feelings which a long course of industrious agitation has engendered. Coming, as we do, into the halls of national legislation from all parts of the Union; we cannot be otherwise than prepared frankly to report the present condition of public sentiment among our respective constituents; and I hope that we have it in our power, by reciprocal explanations and by joint action of the kind contemplated by the resolution under consideration, to restore at once that fraternal understanding among the different sections of the Union, without which it is impossible that the Government itself can be maintained, and the permanent happiness of the nation secured. I do not expect, Mr. President, this resolution to be unanimously adopted, either in this House or in the House of Representatives. I know that there are gentlemen committed, in both Houses, to a system of permanent opposition to our scheme of settlement; and it is but reasonable to expect that these persons will, both by votes and speeches, present such opposition to any such resolution as the one before us, as they may suppose to be necessary to the maintenance of their local popularity, or the attainment of other objects of a less reputable character. What I do expect most confidently is, that this resolution, or one of similar import, will be supported by so large a number of both Houses of Congress, as to give assurance to the whole country that no opposition can ever be successfully presented to any part of the plan of adjustment, either now or hereafter, and in any quarter of the Union.

Mr. President, I have not brought forward this resolution as a mere party man, or for the furtherance of mere party ends. Firmly and inflexibly devoted as I have been since the opening days of manhood to the great principles of what is known as the Democratic creed of the country, and desirous on all fitting occasions to give a hearty and unequivocal support to the same, I should scorn myself could I consent to blend the interests of any party with the movement which I have thought proper to originate for the attainment of different and far higher purposes. Nor do I, sir, look to party alone for the support of this resolution. Indeed, in the spirit of sincerity becoming so grave an occasion, I must acknowledge that I should hold it to be quite unsafe to rely alone upon party votes for the adoption of such a measure as is necessary to restore complete quiet to the public mind. I will go further, Mr. President, and acknowledge that I do not recognize either of the great national parties of the country, in their present state and condition, as entirely reliable for the faithful maintenance of the compromise in all its parts. Free-soilism in the North, and Secession in the South, are yet undeniably exerting an influence more or less mischievous in both the old party organizations. And events have occurred recently calculated to excite great alarm in the public mind in regard to the future action of both the parties referred to, touching the faithful execution of the scheme of compromise. I had hoped before I reached this city to find both the Whig and the Democratic party prepared to repudiate all further connection with faction and its wretched devices. My mind had cherished the confident hope that at least the members of the Democratic party in Congress would be prepared to declare their determination to hold no alliance with any body of men pledged to resist the laws, or to keep alive agitation upon the subject of domestic slavery; and I yet trust that a course may be adopted by those gentlemen in Congress in whom I have heretofore confided, and with whom I have delighted to cooperate on great national occasions, more in unison with the ancient dignity of the Democratic faith, and less offensive to my own sense of propriety than certain proceedings which have of late gained a somewhat distressing notoriety. For my own part, Mr. President, I am resolved to hold no political fellowship with any association of men, by whatever name designated, whose opinions do not harmonize perfectly with the opinions of that noble body of lovers of the Union, whom I have the honor, for the present, alone to represent on this floor. What my worthy constituents think on this whole subject is so clearly and strongly set forth in the resolutions recently adopted by our State convention, that I shall ask leave to read them in hearing of the Senate:

Resolutions of the Committee of Thirteen, reported to the State Convention.

"Resolved, 1st, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the people of Mississippi, in a spirit of conciliation and compromise, have maturely considered the action of Congress embracing a series of measures for the admission of California as a State into the Union, the organization of territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico, the establishment of the boundary between the latter and the State of Texas, the suppression of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the extradition of fugitive slaves, and connected with them the rejection of the proposition to exclude slavery from the Territories of the United States, and to abolish it in the District of Columbia; and whilst they do not entirely approve, will abide by it as a permanent adjustment of this sectional controversy.

"Resolved, 2d, That we perceive nothing in the above-recited legislation of the Congress of the United States which should be permitted to disturb the friendly and peaceful existing relations between the Government of the United States and the government and people of the State of Mississippi."

"Therefore, resolved, 3d, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the people of the State of Mississippi will abide by the Union as it is, and by the Constitution of the United States without amendments."

"Resolved, further, 4th, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the asserted right of secession from the Union, on the part of the State or States, is utterly unsanctioned by the Federal Constitution, which was framed to 'establish' and not to destroy the Union of the States, and that no secession can in fact take place, without a subversion of the Union established, and which will not virtually amount in its effects and consequences to a civil revolution.

"Resolved, further, 5th, That, whilst in the opinion of this Convention, such are the sentiments and opinions of the people of the State of Mississippi, still violations of the rights of the people of the State may occur which would amount to intolerable oppression, and would justify a resort to measures of resistance, amongst which, in the opinion of the Convention, the people of the State have designated the following:

"1st. The interference by congressional legislation with the institution of slavery in the States.

"2d. Interference with the trade in slaves in the States.

"3d. Any action of Congress on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in places subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, incompatible with the safety and domestic tranquility—the rights and honor of the slaveholding States.

"4th. The refusal by Congress to admit a new State into the Union on the ground of her tolerating slavery within her limits.

"5th. The passage of any law by Congress prohibiting slavery in any of the Territories.

"6th. The repeal of the fugitive slave law, and the neglect or refusal by the General Government to enforce the constitutional provisions for the recapture of fugitive slaves.

"Resolved, further, 6th, That, in the opinion of this Convention, the people in the recent elections have been governed by an abiding confidence that the said adjustment measures of Congress should be enforced in good faith in every section of the land.

"Resolved, further, 7th, That as the people of the State of Mississippi, in the opinion of this Convention, desire all further agitation of the slavery question to cease, and have acted upon and decided all the foregoing questions, there by making it the duty of this Convention to pass no acts within the purview and spirit of the law under which it was called, this Convention deems it unnecessary to refer to the people, for their approval or disapproval at the ballot-box, its action in the premises.

"Resolved, further, 8th, The Convention having declared in the foregoing resolutions, the position which the people of Mississippi have taken, and which, in the opinion of this Convention, they will continue to occupy, on the great subjects embraced in the resolutions, deems it a duty alike incumbent on us and equally important to the rights of the people to declare that, in our deliberate judgment and in their deliberate judgment, as we believe, the call of this Convention by the Legislature at its late extraordinary session by the act of the 30th of November, 1850, was unauthorized and unnecessary, and that said act in peremptory ordering a Convention of the people of the State to be held, without submitting to them to be settled by the popular vote of the State, the question whether there should be a Convention or no Convention, was an unwarranted assumption of power by the Legislature, at war with the spirit of republican institutions, and an encroachment on the sovereign power of the people."

These resolutions, Mr. President, as all present know, were adopted by an overwhelming majority of the body in which they originated—there being in fact only three voices raised in the Convention in opposition to them. Now, sir, you discover that the sovereign people of Mississippi have formally and deliberately declared, that whilst they "do not entirely approve" the acts referred to in the first of the resolutions just read, yet they will abide by the whole series of these acts as "a permanent adjustment of the sectional controversy" which has been so long pending. You will observe, sir, also, that our Convention has declared further in the sixth resolution, that the people of Mississippi, "in the recent elections, have been governed by an abiding confidence that the said adjustment measures of Congress would be enforced in good faith in every section of the land." Such, sir, is the attitude of the people of Mississippi, and they have thought proper thus to make a public avowal of their opinions and expectations. They have adjudged the measures of compromise worthy of their approval, and they have determined to stand by them firmly and faithfully. They have not attempted to mystify their position, or to conceal their views and wishes in any respect whatsoever. They have a right to expect equal frankness and fidelity to be exercised by their fellow-citizens in other portions of the Confederacy. Through me they request at this moment, from the Senatorial representatives of the co-States of the Union here assembled, a declaration of the willingness of those under whose authority they act, firmly and faithfully to stand by and maintain the plan of adjustment in all its parts. Will honorable Senators speak out boldly and explicitly on this important subject? or will they, by remaining silent, permit themselves and their constituents to be misunderstood among those whose earnest wish it is to reciprocate friendly sentiments with them, and to be allowed to approve them, and to confide fully in them as just men and as patriots?

Let no member of the Senate, Mr. President, from the South say that our northern brethren need no additional assurance from us of our determination to acquiesce in and support the compromise. Events have occurred, as all truthful men will confess, calculated to awaken more or less of doubt as to the position likely to be assumed ultimately by the Southern States of the Union. Let no Senator from the North, either, declare that the people of the South have no right to demand from their fellow-citizens of that section of the Confederacy such an assurance as that embodied in the resolution under consideration. Every intelligent man in America knows the fact, that the number of active politicians in the Northern States is by no means inconsiderable, who stand pledged to agitate for the modification or repeal of the fugitive slave law, as it is called. There are men now in Congress—men who are sometimes, as rumor asserts, permitted to come into party caucuses too—who are not only committed to future agitation in opposition to this law, but who are known to have solemnly declared their opinion to be that it is wholly unconstitutional in all its material provisions. Besides, Mr. President, it is a fact well recollected by us all, and one which has been the source of much complaint and apprehension in the South, that only a small number of the members of this body representing the free States of the North were actually present at the passage of this law, so that their votes could be recorded in its favor.

I am perfectly aware that several of the gentlemen referred to were only accidentally absent, and perhaps all of them had some reason for not being present, other than an unwillingness to be recognized by their constituents as being friendly to this great and essential measure. Indeed, I believe most of them had previously declared their determination, either in converse or otherwise, to support the bill. But it is, notwithstanding, true, that the circumstance of their being absent when the yeas and nays were taken on the final passage of the bill has been seized upon by certain persons in the South, hostile to the public repose, and wielded with great effect against the supporters of the plan of compromise, and to the serious endangerment of the Union itself. Besides, honorable Senators need not be reminded that declarations are constantly made by the enemies of the Union, in different States of the South, that great danger exists of attempts being successfully made, at some future period, by our fellow-citizens of the North, to apply the Wilmot proviso to our vacant Territories, and to overthrow, by Congressional legislation, the system of slavery in the District of Columbia. I have no such apprehension myself, and I know very well that the time has forever passed when either of the measures referred to could receive the sanction either of this body or of the House of Representatives. But until a formal declaration shall be made, in some such mode as that now proposed, of a determination to refrain from these acts of aggression, formerly so seriously menaced, it is unreasonable to expect all uneasiness on these points entirely to cease.

I have now, Mr. President, stated a few of the most prominent reasons which induced me to offer this resolution, and I will conclude what I have to say for the present, by declaring the high gratification which I shall feel at its obtaining the general support of the members of this body. I shall say nothing more, unless the resolution should be attacked in such a manner as to make some special defence of it necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I do not propose to say much upon this subject at this time; but I will say that when I heard of this resolution, I heard of it with surprise. It is a mode of proceeding scarcely known, I believe, in any deliberative body that I ever heard of. To introduce at a subsequent session of the Legislature resolutions confirming what I suppose must be regarded as statutes upon the statute-book, is an ex post facto mode of reviewing the past. And for what purpose? If the legislation referred to by the honorable Senator from Mississippi be wicked, can he restore purity to it by a resolution of this kind? If that legislation be wise, is it not supererogatory and unnecessary to introduce such a resolution? For what purpose, then, is the resolution introduced? I have no right to arraign the gentleman's motives, nor do I. What may have been his object, I have no right to dispute, for he has avowed it; but as to what will be the effect of this resolution, I have a right to speak. If the gentleman had been selecting motions to introduce, he could not have been more successful in introducing one to open former discussions, and to let loose upon this land the waters of agitation. I protest against this mode of proceeding as unusual, as unnecessary, and as—I will not say intended, because I shall not use any word of the kind—but the tendency of which will be to widen breaches which already exist, and to reach feelings that might perhaps have subsided under the influence of time or a better understanding among ourselves. I understand the honorable Senator from Mississippi to introduce the resolution with a view to give to the measures of compromise an authority which they do not possess by the act of legislation conducted with all the forms which the Constitution requires. Can he expect to do so? Can he give them any other authority—any other influence by a vote of this Senate than they would have had without it? Can he reconcile me to these measures by his vote or the vote of his friends? Sir, he knows the opinion I entertain of these measures, and the manner in which they were introduced and passed in this body. I then denounced them. I now denounce them; because I believe that they have made a precedent in the political history of this country, under the influence of which this Union, wielded by a despotic majority, will survive the Constitution. I believe now, as I believed then, that they were passed in violation of the spirit of the guarantees calculated to protect one section of this Union. Does the gentleman suppose that the South is to have security by an assurance such as he proposes? Does he expect that I, who have heretofore denounced these measures, shall now consent to put upon them the seal of approbation, and to kiss the rod of oppression, as I have regarded it? Sir, I cannot, with Druidical devotion, worship at the foot of a tree whose fruits are to be bitterness and destruction to my posterity.

If there is any one thing in the political history of this country that will be developed by time, it will be this: that the Constitution of the United States never can be amended. I think it may be proclaimed as a settled fact, that the Constitution, which has been in operation for more than sixty years, never will be amended. And why? Because as soon as we meet with any difficulty from the administration of the Government—as soon as any trying juncture of affairs is presented—what is the expedient? Do we apply that great principle provided for in the Constitution of the United States, by which it can be amended? No, sir. The resort is to compromise, or to enlarging, by construction, some of the provisions of the Constitution. Who is it that will dictate compromises of this kind, and give to the Constitution its character under their operation? Will it be the minority? Will it be those whose interests have suffered and whose interests are in danger? No, sir. Whenever constitutions have to be patched up by compromises, or to be changed by construction, depend upon it, such propositions will never come from a minority. All expedients of that kind will proceed from a majority—the majority who have the temptation of interest to consult in giving character to the institutions of the country.

I am unwilling to go further into this debate at this time, except to protest against this mode of attempting to influence the deliberations of another assembly in my own State. I was in hopes that they would be allowed to deliberate the great question which they are called upon to consider fairly, and under auspices favorable to the protection of those whose rights have been violated, in my opinion, and whose political existence will be doomed, if expedients of this kind are to be submitted to by those who represent that section of the country. Will the honorable gentleman tell me that our institutions are not in danger, when he tells us that the billows of the free-soil agitation are already beating upon the base of the Constitution? When he tells me that our institutions are in danger from agitation of this kind, does he expect to give me security by having a vote in favor of measures which I have heretofore denounced and made war upon, and shall continue to denounce and make war upon, as our fathers made war on the alien and sedition laws, as long as I believed they had been framed in a spirit unfavorable and unfriendly to the rights and institutions of those whom I represent?

If this discussion had not been commenced, I do not think I should have opened my mouth upon this subject during this session of Congress, and I have uttered these few sentences to let the gentleman know my position, and to let him know the opinions entertained by more than myself. It may be that by singing his peans to the Union he may hush for a moment the tumult and opposition of those who would never have made war upon it if it had not been patched up and patched up by compromise, and compromise, and compromise! From whom do these compromises come? Never from the weaker portion.

Sir, I believe that the Southern people are a doomed people if proceedings of this kind are allowed to go forth. God knows there is no man upon earth who would go further than myself to prevent anarchy, and hostility, and blood, and violence in this age of reason, intelligence, and wisdom, to effect any reforms. It is alien to the genius of our institutions and the spirit of the common law of England, to effect any reform by violence and civil war. But if the Southern people and the Southern Representatives are not more united, I cannot answer for consequences. If these measures, which are intended, I suppose, to be somewhat improved by this indorsement, are intrinsically good, I cannot perceive any advantage to be derived from this resolution. It does look to me very much as if the gentleman was following the example of Lycurgus, who, after making laws, imposed on those who were to obey them the injunction that they were never to be changed—

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Until he returned.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps the Senator is going away, wishing to leave injunctions like those which Lycurgus left.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I shall certainly come back. Lycurgus did not return.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman, then, is imitating Lycurgus. He does not wish these laws to be changed until he does come back; and he says that he is coming back.

Mr. FOOTE. The difference is that Lycurgus went away with the intention never to return, whereas I go animus revertendo, for I design returning in little more than a year from this time.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the gentleman intends to be superior to Lycurgus. He is going to come back when he pleases. Nothing can prevent him; not even death itself. I understood that Lycurgus went away expecting to die. I would not wish any such fate to befall the gentleman; but it is not for him to control his fate and to come back whenever he pleases.

Mr. FOOTE. My Union-loving Legislature will send me back.

Mr. BUTLER. That is relying upon the fidelity of your "faithful commoners."

Mr. FOOTE. I do rely upon them.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to protract my remarks. I may have occasion when I have deliberated more upon the subject to say something else. I would wish to say nothing now inconsistent with the gravity of the subject and what should become the deliberations of this body. If the debate shall be continued hereafter, I may take occasion to go into it fully.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I shall claim the attention of the Senate, Mr. President, for a short period only, in responding to the very extraordinary harangue with which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] has favored us this morning. The exhibition which has just drawn to a close, sir, must have surprised every member of this body, as assuredly it has astounded myself; though there seems to be more or less reason to suppose that the honorable gentleman did not come to the conclusion to entertain us in a manner so striking and peculiar without considerable previous deliberation. Indeed, I should conjecture, from something in the honorable gentleman's manner and certain attendant circumstances, that the part which he has deemed it becoming to enact this morning, was devolved upon him, to some extent, as the result of previous concert and consultation. At any rate, it would be wronging the gentleman, I imagine, very greatly not to suppose that the speech which he has just delivered was the fruit of much meditation, as surely it ought to have been. Well, sir, I will accord to the gentleman all the credit to which he may be intrinsically entitled for having made just such a temperate, dignified, and statesman-like speech, as might have been expected from a Senator of his high reputation after the fullest deliberation and the amplest consultation.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had concert with no human being, and very little deliberation upon this resolution, for I only heard of it a short time ago.

Mr. FOOTE. Then the gentleman has had the misfortune to have been inops concilii. It would seem that he has neither consulted his friends nor his own sound understanding, as in justice to himself and the grave subject under consideration, he should have done before he ventured upon that stormy sea of controversy, amid whose swelling waves he has been essaying to navigate. What the honorable gentleman can see in this poor resolution of mine to justify him in that fierce revolutionary harangue, to which he has just given utterance, is entirely beyond my powers of discernment. Is there anything in the resolution personally insulting to that gentleman, or his sensibilities? Is there anything in it insulting to any of the sovereign States of this Confederacy? Was there anything in the few remarks which I offered to the Senate in support of the resolution, breathing the least discourtesy or suggestive of the least disrespect to any human being in the world? The Senate will bear me witness that I am innocent in all these respects; and yet the gentleman says that this is a very offensive resolution; and he rather intimates that it is intended to have a special effect in some vicinage of the South, where deliberations are now in progress which the honorable gentleman fears may be more or less disturbed by the adoption of such a resolution as the one before us. Sir, I confess that I do not exactly understand the honorable gentleman upon this point. Certainly the resolution was introduced for no sinister or concealed purpose, nor for any purpose not clearly explained by me already. It is quite a mistake to suppose that I designed to interfere at all with any such deliberations as he more than hints may be now going on in his own State, having in view the withdrawal of that respected State from the Confederacy. Indeed I did not at all advert to the fact, in offering the resolution to the consideration of the Senate, that such deliberations as the gentleman refers to were going on. I will deal very frankly with the gentleman and the Senate, Mr. President, in reference to this very delicate point, and say that if the favorable action of the Senate upon this resolution should have the effect of quieting excitement in South Carolina, and effectually reconciling that noble State to remaining in the Confederacy, I shall be rejoiced beyond measure at such a result. But, sir, I again solemnly disclaim having intended to intermeddle with the special domestic concerns of any State in the Confederacy, or to obstruct any proceedings of a domestic character which may be now in progress in South Carolina.

But the gentleman says, and certainly not with his accustomed courtesy, that, in his judgment, this resolution is unwise and unnecessary. That is the gentleman's opinion. Well, sir, in my judgment, I will not say the resolution is a wise one, as this might look a little egotistical, but I will aver that I consider it quite a judicious one, and, under all the circumstances which surround us, almost indispensably necessary to the public repose and safety. I wish to make known to the honorable gentleman, also, that, (varying very decidedly from his own example on this occasion,) I did not introduce the resolution until I had made the movement which it proposes the subject of much calm and dispassionate examination, nor until I had consulted, as to the expediency of offering it, many gentlemen of acknowledged wisdom and of tried patriotism; and its introduction was therefore not determined upon by me until men far sager than myself had thus aided me with their valuable counsels. I regret that I have not had the good fortune to secure the honorable gentleman's cooperative aid in support of my resolution; and he will allow me to express the regret, which I should certainly feel, should I find out, or have reason to believe hereafter, that he would have been somewhat more inclined to have been a co-laborer with me on this occasion had the State of Mississippi not refused so signally in September last to cooperate with certain persons in South Carolina in breaking up the Union. I protest most seriously against such a perversion of the lex talionis principle on the part of the honorable gentleman.

The Senator said, I think, something about his not being willing to worship at the foot of a tree that bears poisonous fruit; and he says this in reference to the measures of compromise referred to in the resolution. I am not entirely certain that I duly comprehend this figurative language, which, to say the least of it, is as mystical in meaning as it is trite in allusion; but if I am to understand the honorable Senator as comparing the whole series of measures embraced in the plan of adjustment to a tree bearing fruit destructive of human life, then I must tell him that no such death-producing fruit has yet fallen from the boughs of that godly tree upon the sacred soil of Mississippi, and that I am of opinion that the honorable gentleman has been unfortunate enough wholly to have misconceived the true character and bearing of the measures in question.

Sir, what are those measures, that they should thus be denounced before the country? Have they so operated as to injure any State of the Confederacy in any substantial respect whatsoever? Have they not rescued the Republic from such dangers as never were known to menace it with destruction at any former period of our history? Is there a single one of them all that can be justly charged with violating the Constitution, or with threatening serious detriment, or any detriment whatever, to any section of the Union in all coming time? I shall not at present go into a minute examination of these measures; it is not necessary. But the Senate, I know, will bear with me whilst I offer a brief and running commentary upon them, in order to show how little they deserve the harsh crimination which they have this day received at the hands of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in the progress of a speech which, I must say, has been declamatory from beginning to end, and in which I cannot now recollect a single sentence that approximated to the dignity of argument.

To begin with the California question. Sir, it is perfectly well known here that I did not vote for the admission of California. It was not in my power to do so, without violating public sentiment among my own particular constituents, unless indeed that act should be made to form part of a general scheme of settlement; and I decidedly preferred, at any rate, voting for the retention of California in the territorial condition for a year or two. My reasons for desiring that this should be the condition of California for a short period, were stated very frankly and fully at the time, in hearing of this body, and I shall not now recite them. But I wish it to be understood, sir, that I never regarded such act of admission as at all violative of the Constitution. On the contrary, I have constantly been of opinion, that there was no ground for doubt upon this point; and I am happy to recollect that my own honored constituents have at all time, with singular unanimity, entertained the same opinion. Indeed, Mr. President, I think myself justified in believing that there were never, even in this body, any considerable number of gentlemen who were willing to risk their character as public men before the country, by the assertion that the act of Californian admission was unconstitutional in its character. I well recollect that the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who sits over the way, [Mr. HUNTER,] in his celebrated protest, cautiously declined the assumption of any such position, and if I do not err in memory, that gentleman intimated, at the time of its presentation here, an impression that the measure of admission was not fairly subject to objection upon mere constitutional grounds. If the honorable Senator from South Carolina, to whom I am at present responding, entertained the opinion upon this question which he now expresses, he certainly made nothing like a regular argument in support of this view of the subject, or if he did do so, it was not of a nature sufficiently striking to fix itself distinctly in my memory. Sir, California was admitted just in the mode adopted for the admission of every new State that has heretofore entered into the Confederacy. If she was unconstitutionally admitted, none of the new States heretofore admitted have ever yet found their way into the Confederacy in such manner as to entitle them to recognition, as legitimately appertaining to our Confederacy of sovereign States. Sir, I will not argue the question at length; it would be wholly profless to do so. But let me ask the honorable Senator if it be in his power to show in what manner the admission of California has been at all detrimental to any of the older States of the Confederacy? In what respect is it possible that any such detriment could have been experienced? Have the people of California not been as good citizens since their admission as one of the sovereign States of this Union, as they were antecedent thereto? Have not the governmental proceedings of that new State been such as should command the respect of the nation? Is it not an ascertained fact, and does not the gentleman from South Carolina know, that the people of California have shown themselves as free from all sentiments of hostility to our peculiar institutions of the South as the citizens of any Southern State in the Union? If he is not aware of the fact, I beg leave to inform him, that the sentiment of fanatical opposition to the system of domestic slavery existing in the South, has never yet made itself manifest in the legislative councils of this new State. I say this in hearing of those altogether competent to correct me if I am in error upon the subject. Besides, the Senator from South Carolina should recollect that California, from the moment of her admission, has been represented in this Chamber by a gentleman whom we all respect, and who on all occasions has shown himself, in reference to the delicate and distracting questions which have placed the Republic in so much jeopardy, a true patriot, a zealous supporter of the constitutional rights of the South, and an unswerving friend of the Union. The admission of California, then, I contend has done us no injury, and the particular section of which the honorable Senator from South Carolina is the faithful and efficient representative here, has had no reason, thus far, to complain of such admission.

Now, sir, let us turn our attention for a moment to what is called the territorial acts. These bills provide territorial governments for Utah and New Mexico, without the Wilmot proviso. Again, each of these acts provides, in the most emphatic and distinct manner, for the extension of the Constitution and laws of the Union to said Territories: thus securing, as I suppose all jurists worthy of the name would decide, the effectual abrogation of the Mexican laws abolishing slavery. These acts provide, as the Senator well knows, in addition, that the Territories to which they apply, when they shall become States, shall come into the Union with or without slavery, as the people thereof may, in their constitution, decide; and this provision is equally effectual in regard to all the States into which these Territories may be hereafter subdivided. Surely the Senator from South Carolina will rejoice with me that such are the terms on which territorial governments have been established in Utah and New Mexico, instead of extending to them what is known as the Missouri compromise line, as some ultraists in the South have contended should have been done. We all know that the Missouri compromise provides, in express terms, for the prohibition of slavery in all the territories of the Union north of 36° 30' north latitude. Now the principle of this boasted compromise applied to Utah would have at once driven all the slaveholders and their slaves now resident there, and enjoying the protection of law therein, beyond the confines of that Territory, and have closed the same forever to the reception of slavery; since all of Utah is known to be situated north of the line of 36° 30'. How this could at all benefit the South, remains yet for the learned doctors of the Secession school to show. To my simple apprehension it would be nothing more nor less than applying the hated Wilmot proviso to Utah. Sir, let me remind the Senator from South Carolina of the fact, that every Southern Senator, save two, voted for the Utah bill. Especially do I wish to remind him that his close and intimate ally, the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] voted for the Utah bill, as he did also, according to his own declaration to me this morning, for the New Mexican territorial bill—which is in all material respects correspondent therewith. Surely the honorable gentleman from South Carolina will not think of seriously reprehending this portion of the measures of adjustment, since, in order to do so with effect, he will have to unite in censuring those with whom I know it has long been his highest pride to act here.

Is it the Texas and New Mexican boundary act that the honorable gentleman supposes should awaken so much dissatisfaction to the South? As to this point I shall ask leave to turn him over to the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] under whose monitions, and at the instigation of whose eloquent persuasions, the Senate is known to have given its sanction to this measure. By this act the disputed boundary line between Texas and New Mexico was definitively settled, and civil war, then seriously menaced, most happily prevented. The territory purchased from Texas now placed under the authority of the Government of New Mexico, became part of the Union under the resolution of Texan annexation; which resolution provided expressly that all new States into which Texas might be subdivided at any future period, lying north of 36° 30' north latitude, should be free States. It has been seen that the act establishing a territorial government for New Mexico, brought into operation a principle far more favorable than this rule of 36° 30' to our Southern institutions. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to this important emendation of the Texan resolution of annexation, when, as he must perceive, by means of it, slave States are allowed to spring up hereafter, where before this plan of settlement was adopted it was impossible that any but free States could exist?

Perhaps the gentleman mainly objects to the District of Columbia bill, as it is called. Well, sir, if he does, I have to say to him that he objects to what has been the law of this District during the whole of the present century. The act of Congress of 1801, to which the signature of Thomas Jefferson was attached, which adopted the old Maryland law on this subject and gave full validity and binding effect to the same in the part of the District not retroceded at the period of this enactment to the State of Virginia, having been far more stringent in its terms than the act of 1850; the former having provided, under the precise penalties of the present law, too, not only against the bringing of slaves into the District for sale here, or for deposit here and sale elsewhere, but having denounced the penalty of forfeiture, &c., of all slaves brought hither, for any purpose whatsoever.

I can scarcely believe that the honorable gentleman can have intended to be understood on this occasion as murmuring over the passage of the fugitive slave law; though I believe I do not err in supposing the Senator from South Carolina not to have attached as much importance to this particular enactment as some other gentlemen are known to have done, who represented in Congress the border States of the Union. I recollect, too, quite vividly, various declarations, in this Chamber and elsewhere, at different times, made by certain Southern gentlemen of extreme opinions, that no great appreciation was due to this particular enactment, since it only carried out a plain provision of the Constitution. It is also not forgotten by me, and I hope that it is not forgotten by the Senate either, that this particular act would have been passed by the two Houses of Congress at a much earlier period of the session before the last than it was, but for the fact that it was not deemed politic by certain Southern Senators, who had special charge of the subject, to report a bill for the recapture and restoration of fugitives from service until it should be ascertained that all the other questions connected with the subject of domestic slavery were likely to be satisfactorily disposed of in Congress. The Senate will remember my former exposition of this matter here, and cannot have forgotten my statement of an important matter of fact connected with this delicate point, when I declared, in hearing of honorable Senators from the South, who could not deny the truth of what I said, that the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] and other Senators from the States of the North, now present, and whom I could easily name, requested me to see the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and the Senator from South Carolina, to whom I am now replying, at a very early day of the session then in progress, and to urge upon them both the importance of their reporting a bill without delay which, when it should become a law, would secure full justice to the South in regard to fugitives from service, pledging themselves to vote for any bill which should be thus reported, which should be free from constitutional objections. The motives of honorable Senators in not reporting this bill earlier I have never arraigned, nor do I on the present occasion. They were doubtless conscientious in their action, though I thought them at the time injudicious in the course adopted by them, as I still do: the reason given me for delaying the reporting of this bill, that if the question involved therein should be satisfactorily adjusted at that time, it might prove impossible thereafter to rouse the border States to energetic action in co-operation with the other Southern States, for the vindication of their essential rights, never having been considered by me to be of a character sufficiently solid to entitle it to operate potentially upon the deliberations of Congress. I repeat, Mr. President, that I cannot suppose that the honorable Senator from South Carolina could have seen anything in this particular law to demand that exhibition of his powers of parliamentary oburgation which we have witnessed this morning. To be sure, I was aware that when the President of the United States, in the course of the last winter, called our attention to the riotous proceedings in Boston, in opposition to this law—a painful remembrance of which I suppose all now present to bear in mind—there were Southern Senators present, yea, sir, Southern Senators, too, who assume to be the peculiar and exclusive guardians of the South—who did not hesitate to avow the opinion that any attempt on the part of the Executive to put down, by military force, such an armed opposition to the law as was known to have been set on foot, would be a most outrageous usurpation of authority, and a serious violation of the rights of the sovereign State of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this doctrine was at the time most justly denounced in this body, and its upholders most deservedly chastised; and the same doctrine has been regularly adjudged, by all intelligent men in the South, to have been in its inception little better than sheer nonsense.

Now, sir, I shall state a proposition to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, to which I invoke his special attention. There is no part of the plan of compromise that is repealable in its character except the fugitive slave bill and the District of Columbia bill. The latter I have shown to be unworthy of a moment's consideration. California is already in the Union, and there is no remedy known to the Constitution by means of which she can be expelled therefrom and restored to the territorial state. The territorial governments are established, and on such principles as Southern men have always advocated; and I suppose that the honorable Senator would hardly contend that Congress could, otherwise than by a palpable usurpation of power, and a most shameless violation of vested rights, deprive the people of Utah and New Mexico, so long cut off from the blessings of regular government, of the protection now afforded to them by the Governments under which they live. Texas has received her ten millions of dollars, or a large portion thereof, and all sensible men know that there are no constitutional means of getting it back without her consent; whilst no one possessed of a particle of sanity would conjecture that she would ever willingly restore the benefits of a contract so manifestly advantageous to her. The great practical question at last upon my resolution is, Shall the fugitive slave law be faithfully enforced? In other words, Will our brethren of the North, through their representatives in the two Houses of Congress, now declare, in some formal legislative mode, that they will hereafter exert themselves faithfully and energetically to give full effect to this law, and thus evince their determination to see perfect justice done to their fellow-citizens of the South? I repeat, this is the only important question now before the Senate; and I must be permitted to declare my profound regret at finding that every Senator from the South is not found willing to coöperate in a movement upon the success of which the security and repose of that section of the Union are undeniably staked.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has been pleased to complain, specially, and with an emphasis not a little imposing, that the time seems to have gone by for amendments of the Constitution of the United States, without which, I suppose, the honorable gentleman would have us to understand the Southern States of the Union cannot remain safely in the Confederacy. This is not the first time that I have heard this proposition stated in this Chamber. When I heard it first, I was not a little startled by its enunciation. I protested against it the next day as of a character highly dangerous to the peace of the country. I meet it again now in the same spirit, for I consider the honorable Senator from South Carolina as clearly intimating that some constitutional amendment is at this moment indispensable to the peace and happiness of the Union. Sir, the only constitutional amendment that I have heard of lately, is that extraordinary one recommended in a certain posthumous political volume with which I hope every man in America will shortly make himself acquainted. The amendment suggested in this volume proposes, that instead of choosing one President of the United States, we should hereafter have two elected—one from the North, by Northern votes—one from the South, by Southern votes. Each of these Presidents, I believe, to have the command of the Army and Navy of the Union, and a double veto power is to be exercised by them. Such an amendment would, as every man of practical good sense in the world will readily decide, break up the Union in about four or five weeks. Now, if it is such a fantastical amendment as this, or anything like it, that the honorable gentleman from South Carolina wishes incorporated into that sacred instrument, I would counsel him most seriously to let the Constitution of our fathers alone for the present, or at least to be certain that he has some scheme of emendation already matured more worthy of approval than the one just specified, before he ventures either to obtrude it on the attention of his countrymen, or to complain that this noblest production of the human understanding has lost all those high capacities which the wise men of the land once supposed it to possess, of securing the freedom and happiness of the millions living under its protection, as long as civilization and social virtue should continue to dwell in this favored hemisphere.

The honorable gentleman complains somewhat vehemently of the want of union in the South, and declares that the Southern States will be inevitably ruined unless there is more of concord and united action among them. There are two answers to this part of the honorable gentleman's speech. First, I am of opinion that the South is really already in quite a united condition—every Southern State, except South Carolina, having clearly and undeniably decided in favor of acquiescence in the acts of Adjustment; and secondly, if there is a want of absolute union in the South upon the questions embraced in the plan of settlement, it is simply because a small minority of Southern men, who seem to imagine themselves the whole South, refuse to pay a proper deference to the views of an overwhelming majority, who are entirely satisfied with what Congress has done to compose the troublesome feelings of the nation, which minority are constantly urging upon their countrymen some visionary project, of one kind or another, supposed by them to be an absolute sine qua non to the true happiness and glory of the nation.

I feel justified in adding, sir, that the intelligent citizens represented in this body by the gentleman himself, are quite inclined to allow the country to return to that state of repose which it formerly enjoyed; inasmuch as they have recently determined, by an overwhelming majority, not to secede from the Union on account of grievances imagined at present to exist, nor until some other Southern State shall testify a willingness to unite with them in this perilous experiment—which I confidently believe is a state of things that will never be realized. Sir, I must be allowed to express the high gratification which I have derived from the final decision of the people of South Carolina in opposition to the mischievous counsels of that band of demagogues who have sought to involve them in schemes of rank disunion and foul treason. I have rejoiced particularly over this happy result. Mr. President, because I had more than a year since predicted it both here and elsewhere. I always believed that the people of South Carolina, when allowed to think calmly and to act maturely upon this vital and momentous question of Union and Disunion, would so demean themselves as to prove to the world their utter unwillingness deliberately to surrender their own repose and happiness in order to gratify the unscrupulous aspirations of ambitious demagogues. I rejoice, sir, that the materials have been thus supplied for that which cannot but be recognized by posterity as the brightest page in the history of this ancient Commonwealth; and I trust that the day is yet far distant when, deluded by evil counsels, her people shall deliberately prefer the scenes of bloody anarchy and lawless confusion to the multiplied and unappreciable blessings which result from the sound and honest administration of a wise and beneficent government.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make an explanation. I must advert to some of the remarks of the gentleman. There is one part of his remarks that applied to me, I suppose, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in delaying to bring in the fugitive slave bill at as early a time as practicable, that it might have been acted upon. Now that fugitive slave bill was introduced by myself, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, one session before it was taken up and acted upon at all. I hope that as long as I am the chairman or the organ of the committee, I shall never use my accidental position for any party purpose whatever. It has been my practice, as the representative of a committee, to bring in any measures ordered by that committee as early as practicable, and I brought in that measure one session before it was finally adopted. When my friend from Virginia [Mr. MASON] offered a substitute for it it was then in his hands, so far as regarded the amendment. That bill was called up in the early part of the session for consideration, and as the chairman of the committee I made some remarks upon it. I was followed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MASON], when, at the instance of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY], these compromise measures were introduced, with a request that the consideration of the fugitive slave bill should be suspended until it should make a part of those measures.

Now, what my honorable friend from Virginia may have said to the gentleman in private, I know not. I do not undertake to say what he may have remarked, for I have had no conversation with him on the subject. I am not very much in the habit of repeating private conversations. I have no doubt that my friend from Virginia might have said, Why take up this measure separately and alone, and thus weaken ourselves in the great contest in which we are engaged? I may say that there is no one on this floor who has acted so many different parts as the Senator from Mississippi. If I recollect aright his name was signed to a paper, which was sent to the Governor of his State, warning the people of that State against the dangers which were impending over us by one of the measures he has so much praised to-day.

Mr. FOOTE. All of which are obviated by this scheme of adjustment.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator condemned that measure separately. He denounced it alone. But it seems that when it went with something else, he was willing to acquiesce.

Mr. FOOTE. I wish to explain. I did unite in a letter which the gentleman has evidently not read, in which I did state, on the 21st of January, of that very session, that California would be admitted into the Union, and united also in calling for instructions from the Legislature of the State as to what that body might deem right and proper, under the circumstances, if California should be admitted. There is not one word in that letter intimating the unconstitutionality of the admission of California. I had introduced a resolution early in the session asserting the expediency of establishing a territorial government in California. I had made a speech in support of it, and the only one that was made. I did not oppose the admission of California on constitutional grounds at all, but on grounds of expediency, and from regard to what I deemed the usage applying to such cases. After that, when there was a proposition pending in both Houses of Congress to admit California as a separate measure, conceiving, as I did, that its admission, in this form, would be objectionable; that instead of settling the questions growing out of the institution of slavery it would obstruct such settlement; under these circumstances I united in that letter. I said in that letter, which was very hastily drawn up by one of my colleagues, but which I still stand by, as my name was subscribed to it, that the application of California to obtain admission into the Union, under all the circumstances of the case, was (not the Wilmot proviso) but an attempt to obtain the passage of the Wilmot proviso in another form. I said it was an attempt, on the part of those pressing it as a separate measure, to obtain precisely those advantages in favor of the North over the South in California which the Wilmot proviso contemplated; but I aver that I never did undertake to say, in any shape or form, either to our Governor or to any one else, that I conceived the admission of California to be unconstitutional, and that its admission would justify extreme measures on the part of the South. What I insisted upon was, that it should form part of a general scheme of adjustment. I speak in the presence of Senators who recollect my whole course on the subject.

I did not charge the Senator himself with having the conversation to which I alluded in reference to the fugitive slave bill, but the gentleman must recollect that I went to him repeatedly and urged that the bill should be reported to the Senate. My friend from Indiana, [Mr. WHITCOMB], and my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CASS], will recollect that they urged me to go to these gentlemen and request them to bring forward the bill. I performed my mission, and was answered in the manner I have before stated. The gentleman being known to be on terms of extreme intimacy and confidence with the Senator from Virginia, when the latter gentleman replied to my proposition in the manner which I have before reported to the Senate, I did conceive they were acting upon something like a concerted plan. I did not undertake to censure them, for I have no doubt they both conceived it inexpedient at that time to push that particular question to a settlement; since other questions remained unsettled, the adjustment of which would be facilitated, as they may have supposed, by keeping the fugitive slave question open.

Mr. BUTLER. The explanation which I gave of what took place in reference to the fugitive slave bill cannot be contradicted. It is my duty, perhaps, to refer to some other remarks of the Senator, and to say something with regard to them. I intend to be very cool and deliberate.

Mr. FOOTE. If the honorable Senator understood me as saying anything at all calculated to connect him with any improper movements here or elsewhere, adverse to the Union, he misunderstood me.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 9, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. HOUSTON, of Texas, appeared in his seat this morning.

PETITIONS.

Mr. MILLER. I have been requested to present the petition of petty officers in behalf of the crew of the United States frigate Congress, asking Congress to repeal a certain amendment made to the Navy appropriation bill at the last session, which deprives them of what they consider an important privilege. I beg leave to state of what it is they complain. Ever since the organization of the Government, the seaman has had the privilege of receiving money in lieu of such rations as, by a very rigid economy in the consumption of his allowance, could be stopped, by which he was enabled to provide himself with some comforts which did not belong to the ration. The Naval Committee at the last session of Congress deprived him of that privilege, and now he is compelled to take his rations as they come to him.

Now, Mr. President, there are few men in the service of the Government who have fewer comforts than the common seaman, and yet at the same time, no man could enjoy those little comforts more than he does. We deprived him of his grog. He, being a man of reform, submitted to that. We took away flogging; with Christian patience he submitted to that. And now, we have made an attack upon this little privilege of commutating his rations. That is too much for the sailor even to bear. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and hope that it will receive their early attention.

The petition was so referred.

Mr. CLARKE presented the petition of Elizabeth Arnold, only daughter of Jonathan Pitcher, deceased, an officer in the Navy during the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Ambrose W. Thompson, proposing to establish, with the approbation of Congress, a line of mail steamers between California and China; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CLARKE submitted documents relating to the claim of Samuel Crafin, a pensioner of the United States, to an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of volunteers in the last war with Great Britain, praying a further grant of bounty lands to the officers and soldiers of that war; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Easton, Northampton county, Pennsylvania, praying a further grant of bounty lands to the officers and soldiers of the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the enactment of a law to prohibit the introduction into the ports of the United States of foreign convicts, felons, and paupers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Leonard J. Thomas, praying that pensioners under the act of April 24, 1816, may be entitled to draw pensions from the date of the passage of said act; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented the memorial of Mary W. Thompson, widow of Alexander B. Thompson, deceased, late an officer in the Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BADGER presented the memorial of Joseph Gideon, praying compensation for services performed by him as an acting purser in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BORLAND presented a petition of the late and present land officers at Clarksville, Arkansas, praying additional compensation for services in locating military bounty land warrants; and stated that a bill answering the prayer of the petitioners had three times passed the Senate and failed in the House for various reasons. It was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of George C. Paine and Polly Teall, heirs of Brinton Paine, deceased, an officer in the revolutionary war, praying to be allowed back pay and a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a memorial of the committee of the Industrial Congress of New York, praying that no change may be made in the existing bounty land laws tending to increase speculation in the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Adam Hays, a pensioner of the United States, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented two petitions of citizens of Virginia, and a petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying that the office of Chaplain in the public service may be abolished; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Hiram Moore and John Hascall, praying an extension of their patent for a harvesting machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, the petition of the register and receiver of the land office at Sault St. Marie, praying compensation for services in the entry of lands on military bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Monroe county, Michigan, praying certain amendments to the law of July 7, 1838, for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN presented a memorial of members of the bar and citizens of California, praying that the salary of the district judge for the northern district of California may be increased, and said: Since that court has been organized it has been ascertained that the business is of the highest importance, and that the labor is very great. The judge has discharged his duties with great ability and to the satisfaction of the whole country, and it is the unanimous wish of the people of California that he should have his compensation increased. The memorial is drawn up with great ability, and covers the case.

It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHASE presented the memorial of James B. Moore, Josiah Lawrence, and Henry H. Goodman, of Ohio, and John H. Deihl, of Pennsylvania, and their associates, proposing, with the aid of Government, to establish a regular line of mail steamers from California or Oregon to China; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of H. P. Dorsey, a citizen of California, praying indemnity for loss by Indian depredations, in consequence of the want of adequate protection from the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Frances Moore, legal representative of John Moore, deceased, praying the payment of certain indents issued by the State of South Carolina, in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

CASE OF MR. THRASHER IN CUBA.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to present a petition from many respectable citizens of New Jersey in behalf of Mr. John S. Thrasher. It is a matter of some consequence, and I therefore ask that it may be read.

The petition was read, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, inhabitants of the city of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, respectfully beg leave to represent: That many of us are personally acquainted with Mr. John S. Thrasher, an American citizen, now a prisoner in the dungeons of the Punta Castle, in the city of Havana, and Island of Cuba, under Spanish rule.

They beg leave to state that said Thrasher has uniformly been found a gentleman of the strictest honor and integrity, a warm hearted friend of Americans sojourning in the Island of Cuba, and always ready to extend to his countrymen, when requiring it, his aid, advice, and protection, without fee or reward.

Your petitioners now learn, with pain and surprise, that Mr. Thrasher complains that he has been accused of treason to the Spanish Government, his papers seized, and he thrown into a dungeon, and all communication with his friends strictly prohibited; that he has been denied proper counsel to assist him at his trial; that the representations of our Consul in his behalf have been utterly disregarded; that instead of an open and fair trial, (which he, as an American citizen, was fully entitled to) he was compelled to be tried by a COURT-MARTIAL, in time of peace, without being furnished with copies of the charges against him; and that he had no access to the proceedings or testimony, and knew not of what crime he was accused.

To all these proceedings he made his solemn protest, as against treaty stipulations with his Government, the law of civilized nations, and his rights as an American citizen. Notwithstanding, he was sent back to his dungeon, and, after some days, informed that he had been sentenced to eight years confinement at hard labor, in chains, on the coast of Africa, and to pay costs,—a sentence which, if carried out, would be more dreadful by far than death.

Your petitioners, and the public generally, view this mock trial as a gross violation of our national rights; the more especially as it has not been attempted to be proved that Mr. Thrasher was, in anywise, implicated with the Lopez expedition, further than to do all in his power to give that comfort which common humanity demanded to those suffering in captivity. That he has never extorted himself, though urged by the Spanish Cuban Government to do so, but still claims to be an American citizen, and entitled to a full and fair protection from the American Government, and that he at least have a fair trial, and be furnished with proper counsel of his own or his Government's selection.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that the Congress of the United States will take such measures in this pressing case as will prevent an American citizen of the highest respectability of character, and universally esteemed for his kindness and attention to our fellow-countrymen at Havana, from being sent in chains to serve out a long and horrible confinement as a galley slave, without a fair and full hearing in a proper court of justice, and where he may have proper counsel and full liberty to rebut the charges that may be brought against him.

Mr. STOCKTON. I suppose there is hardly an individual in the Senate, or out of the Senate, that will not agree with me in regard to the importance of this petition. I have the most profound respect for that ancient monarchy, but I wish that it would either mend its laws or its manners. The process by which American citizens are tried there has become no joke. It seems to me to be a very summary process; and punishment follows instantly upon the judgment. I know nothing of the circumstances of this case; but I desire to know something about them. And although I am not for intervention, yet, sir, I am not clear of the idea that American citizens cannot be justly punished in the way some of our citizens have been punished and with the summary process by which they have been adjudged. I hope that upon the investigation of this case, there may not appear to be so much offensive in it, as appears upon the face of that petition. If there is, I shall certainly be prepared to make some other motion—some motion that will testify the feelings of devotion of the Senate to the character and lives of their fellow-citizens abroad. At present, however, I shall satisfy myself by offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, all the information in his possession touching the imprisonment of Mr. John S. Thrasher, in the dungeon of the Punta Castle, in the city of Havana and Island of Cuba.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the resolution was adopted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of members of the bar of Massachusetts, on the files of the Senate, relative to increasing the salary of the United States district judge for that State, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Johnson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims; and that the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Captain George E. McClelland's company of Florida volunteers, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the bill of last session to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," be referred, together with the papers on the files of the Senate, and the report of the Committee, to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Wm. Wilkinson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; also, that the papers of Samuel Draper, on the files of the Senate, praying for compensation in consequence of wounds received in war, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Notices of bills to be hereafter introduced, were given by Mr. WHITCOMB, and Mr. JONES of Iowa.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to change the time for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Mrs. A. M. Dade, widow of the late Major F. L. Dade, United States Army; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALKER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes; and

A bill granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan in aid of the construction of a road from Green Bay to Lake Superior.

Mr. SEWARD, in pursuance of previous notice given by his colleague, [Mr. FISH] asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a Mint of the United States in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RHETT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to indemnify the State of South Carolina for money expended for the United States in the war in Florida with the Seminole Indians; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to aid the State of Louisiana in reclaiming the overflowed lands therein, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BORLAND, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read a first and second time:

A bill allowing exchanges of, and granting additional school lands to, the several States which contain public lands, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and

A bill to establish a port of entry and delivery at Little Rock, in Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BERRIEN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill to regulate the compensation of the district judge of the United States for the district of Massachusetts; and

A bill to be entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgments, in certain cases.'"

Mr. GWIN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for extending the laws and the judicial system of the United States to the State of California," passed 28th September, 1850; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FELCH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, in said State;

A bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Saginaw to Montreal river, with a branch from the Grand river into the same; and

A bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Michigan for saline purposes.

Mr. BORLAND, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles:

A bill for the relief of Mark Bean and Richard H. Bean, of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and

A bill for the relief of the widow of General Worth; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NORRIS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. E. A. McNeil, widow of the late General John McNeil; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to improve the navigation of the Upper Mississippi.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DODGE moved that it be made the special order of the day for Wednesday, the 17th instant; which was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HALE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to interpose the friendly offices of this Government with the President of the Republic of France, in behalf of the liberation of Abd el Kader; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any information the Executive may have received, respecting the firing into, and seizure of, the American steamship Prometheus by a British vessel of war, in November last, near Grey Town, on the Mosquito Coast; and also, what measures have been taken by the Executive to ascertain the state of the facts, and to vindicate the honor of the country.

Mr. BRIGHT, according to previous notice, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following shall be one of the standing rules of the Senate, to wit:

52. The Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, and the Assistant Doorkeeper, shall be chosen on the third Monday of the present (first session of the 31st) Congress, and on the second Monday of the first session of every succeeding Congress.

Its consideration at the present time was objected to; and therefore it lies over.

Mr. DOWNS offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War communicate to the Senate any reports which have been received in reference to the inundations of the Mississippi, and to state whether any further appropriation is required to complete the surveys and investigations heretofore directed.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

Mr. FOOTE of Mississippi. I hope that the special order will now be taken up. (The Compromise Resolution.)

The PRESIDENT. It will be taken up as soon as the morning business is through.

Mr. FOOTE. Is that the invariable order?

The PRESIDENT said it was.

Mr. FOOTE. Some honorable Senators around me seem to think that the special order should be taken up at the appointed hour, unless there should be an express order to the contrary.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the Senator from Mississippi to allow me to call up the resolution in regard to Kossuth.

The PRESIDENT. The hour having arrived for the special order, the Chair will call it. It is the resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE], declaring the measures of the adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the difficulties growing out of the existence of domestic slavery.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask my honorable friend from Mississippi to permit that to lie over for a few minutes. I want to call up the resolution in regard to Kossuth.

Mr. FOOTE. If there was a prospect of passing it, I should hesitate to do anything to prevent it. But the Senator will see that I am placed in a very delicate situation—I have not the floor for the morning. I am here only as an auditor.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair having called for the special order, it can only be postponed by the action of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi insists upon calling for the special order—

Mr. FOOTE. I have not insisted upon it. I have stated that another gentleman has the floor on that resolution. I merely suggested that it should be taken up.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I move to postpone the special order for the present, in order to call up the Kossuth resolution. I think the subject of the measures of adjustment has been tolerably well considered in this body. I want to see this Kossuth resolution disposed of one way or the other. I move to postpone the special order until two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division, ayes 20, noes 13.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone all other business and take up the resolution offered by myself concerning Kossuth.

The PRESIDENT. It is the first resolution on the calendar, which comes up for a second reading.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask that the resolution may be considered and finally disposed of now. And because I am sincerely desirous of its passage, I shall endeavor to promote that object by refraining from any great latitude of debate, at least at present. What I have to say upon the subject will relate simply to the circumstances under which I think the resolution comes before Congress, and the nature and character of the measure which I have submitted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was read accordingly.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I have said that I should abstain from discussing this question on its merits at the present time. I will advert first simply to the circumstances under which it comes before Congress.

If the distinguished personage whom it is the design of this resolution to honor, had floated upon our shores unbidden and unheralded, there would have been no great embarrassment in suffering his arrival to pass without notice by Congress; but the case is widely different. The Congress of the United States found him a prisoner in Asia Minor—an exile from his native land, in an effort for the redemption of which he had fallen. They caused the President of the United States to express to him the sympathy of Congress with him in his exile and misfortunes, and to tender to him an invitation to come to America as an asylum, in one of the public vessels of the nation. The President executed these instructions, and in pursuance of them, it is known to all the world that Kossuth was liberated from his captivity, and he is now upon our shores. The President of the United States, in anticipation of his arrival, informed Congress on their assembling at the present session that he had executed their instructions, and that the arrival of this illustrious man was hourly expected, and he recommended to Congress to take into consideration the proper manner and ceremonial of receiving the guest who had been brought here under their authority. This of itself was sufficient to engage the attention of the civilized world for the action of Congress in relation to the personage whose name and fame filled the eye and ear of the world. But the action of Government has not stopped here. In pursuance of this recommendation, and at the instance of the President and the administration, the subject has been opened in this Chamber—a debate has opened upon the question submitted by the President. Under such circumstances absolute silence would amount to nothing short of neglect, and neglect would be liable to be construed, in my poor judgment, into indignity. It is under these circumstances that this question comes before Congress, and I am sure it is not the intention of the Senate that their treatment of Kossuth should be that of either neglect or indignity. But if such would be the result, the consequence would be the inflicting of a wound upon the generous and noble heart of a friend of liberty, whose gratitude we have awakened and stimulated, and in whose bosom we have kindled the expectation of a warm, a generous, a cordial welcome. The effect would be this upon him. The effect upon his country would be to subdue the feelings of affection and gratitude which the expression of sympathy in their misfortunes heretofore has awakened. The effect of it would be to discourage the hopes and expectations of the friends of freedom throughout the world; and finally, it would have the effect to encourage the advocates of oppression throughout Europe in their efforts to prevent the transition of the nations of Europe from under the system of force to the voluntary system of government which we have established and commended to their adoption. Under such circumstances I was not at liberty to consent to be understood as being willing to allow the arrival of Kossuth in the United States to pass unnoticed. In order that I might put myself right, and give an opportunity to others who might agree with me in opinion to put themselves right, I have endeavored to submit a proposition which would avoid the consequences which have been deplored, and bring this question before Congress in a shape so unexceptionable that it seemed to me all might agree in adopting it.

I will say a word now upon the form of the reception, or welcome, which I propose. It is not in the form which I myself would originally have wished. I have no particular tenacity in regard to it. The proposition submitted by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE] would have received my vote; it would have received it if it had said more, as was proposed by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] It would have received it if it had said less. It would have received my support under any circumstances, if it had been pressed, and I should have endeavored to have cooperated with the honorable mover of it in avoiding any amendment which might have embarrassed its passage through the Senate. But that has passed; and in looking around for what might be substituted for it, it seemed to me that, if there was one sentiment more plainly and universally expressed by the American people than any other, in regard to the Hungarian revolution, and in regard to its hero, the champion of Hungary, it was that of WELCOME TO THE SHORES OF THE UNITED STATES. Taking that idea as my guide, I have submitted a resolution in which it is proposed that Congress shall declare that they give to Louis Kossuth, whom they have brought to our borders, a cordial WELCOME.

Less than this, Mr. President, no man can propose who thinks it proper to make any expression, or take any action; and more than this, it seems to me, must be waived. It must be something like this, or nothing, and this is better than nothing. I would have the passage of this resolution communicated to Kossuth by the President, the Executive organ of the nation. My own feelings would exact more; but I am content to waive them under this consideration—that the simplicity of the act will give it a peculiar value. I know not, in the history of this nation—I know not, in the history of modern times, a more sublime spectacle than would be afforded by seeing the Congress of the United States, in the name and behalf of the American people, bidding Kossuth, the representative of the cause of voluntary government in Europe, a cordial welcome on his escape from the perils of his position, and his arrival in this land where that system of government is established and in full operation.

There is a simplicity in this ceremony which is worthy the dignity of the American Government and of the greatness of the American people; there is a simplicity in it worthy the character of the illustrious citizen whom it is proposed to honor. I have no tenacity in regard to this measure in preference to any other which would make me insist on this at the hazard of its defeat. It seems to me to be preferable to that of the honorable Senator from Illinois, and gentlemen say that they do prefer it upon the ground that this would be the joint act of both Houses of Congress. I am quite sure that if adopted here it would be concurred in by the House of Representatives, and would thus become a national act of welcome. I confess that I am desirous that, as the Congress of the United States caused Kossuth to be brought here under their authority, his reception should be a national act; and that Congress should not be divided in its expression or its action on this the crowning occasion. This form also seems to me to commend itself to the adoption of the Senate, because it stops short of committing Congress or the Government to any action beyond that of simply giving welcome. What I desire is not the utterance of words. What I want to see—what I want to have Congress do, is to extend the welcome which the world expects us to give to the illustrious exile.

Objections have been made, to which I will advert very briefly. It has been said or intimated that we are not well aware of what we are doing—that we are not well acquainted with the character of Kossuth—that we do not know certainly that he is entitled to these attentions from the American people. Sir, in the course of human events we see the nations of Europe struggling to throw off the despotic systems of government, and to establish governments upon the principle of republicanism or of constitutional monarchy. Whenever such efforts are made we see it invariably happen that the existing despotisms of Europe combine to repress those struggles—combine to subdue the people. The consequence is, that despotism is a common cause, and it results also that the cause of constitutional liberty has also become one common cause—the cause of mankind against despotism. Now whatever people leads the way at any time in any crisis in this contest for civil liberty, becomes the representative of the nations of the earth. We once occupied that proud and interesting position, and we engaged the sympathies of civilized men throughout the world. No one can deny, that recently Hungary assumed that same position, and the records of our own Legislature show that we, in common with the friends of civil liberty in Europe, hold Hungary to be the representative of the nations of the earth in this great cause. We had a messenger on the verge of the battle-field ready to acknowledge her independence.

Mr. President, it happens, in the Providence of God, that whenever a nation thus assumes to open this controversy for liberty, in behalf of the nations of the earth, some one man more than another becomes identified with the struggle by his virtues, by his valor, by his wisdom, or by his sufferings, until he eclipses others who may be associated with him, and comes to be regarded by the country itself, in whose behalf he labors and struggles, and by mankind, as the representative of that nation, and of that cause. The deliverance of Switzerland brings up at once the name of William Tell. The struggle of Scotland calls up the name of Wallace; and all over the world no man ever hears the American Revolution spoken of, but it calls up the majestic form of Washington. So it happens that the name of Hungary calls up at once the great, the towering fame of the author, the hero, and the sufferer of the Hungarian Revolution. Now, then, shall we say that we do not know that Kossuth is worthy to be regarded as the friend and advocate of liberty in his own country? Shall we say that he does not merit the homage paid to him, as the leader of the Hungarian Revolution. Hungary herself has set the seal upon his merits, and concluded that question, and it would be as unreasonable and absurd to listen to those who should depreciate the principles or the character of Washington, as it is to stand doubting or hesitating whether, in honoring Kossuth, we are really doing honor to his cause, and the cause of his unfortunate country.

But it is asked, why should the American people engage in paying this homage to Kossuth, granting all his merits, because he has done nothing for America? True, he never did anything for America. We have reached that time when no man living out of America can confer upon us a benefit. We are beyond the reach of beneficence other than at the hand of the Great Creator and Preserver of nations; but do we honor only those? Do we reward only those who confer benefits upon us? Certainly not. We honor those who serve the common cause of civil liberty throughout the world. That cause is our own cause. We honor those who advance and promote it. But, although Kossuth has done nothing for this country, Europe has. It has sent us a Lafayette, a Kosciuszko, a De Kalb, and a Steuben, and thus has created a debt against us, which, while we cannot pay to the illustrious dead, we can discharge towards fit and lawful representatives, in the persons of the illustrious living.

I shall notice a single other objection, and then I shall leave this resolution to its fate. It is an apprehension that, by the adoption of this, or a similar motion, the Congress of the United States will commit itself to some act of intervention in the affairs of Europe by which the Government of the United States may be embarrassed in its foreign relations. Mr. President, I am a lover of peace. I shall never freely give my consent to any measure which I think shall tend to involve this nation in the calamities of foreign war. I believe that our mission is a mission of republicanism. But I believe that we shall best execute it by maintaining peace at home and peace with all mankind; and if I saw in this measure a step in advance towards the bloody field of contention in the affairs of Europe, I, too, would hesitate long before adopting it. But I see no advance towards any such danger in doing a simple act of national justice and magnanimity. I believe that no man will deny the principle, that a nation may do for the cause of liberty in other nations whatever the laws of nations do not forbid. I plant myself upon that principle. What the laws of nations do not forbid, any nation may do for the cause of civil liberty in any other nation, in any other country. Now, the laws of nations do not forbid hospitality. The laws of nations do not forbid us to sympathize with the exile—to sympathize with the overthrown champions of freedom. The laws of nature demand that hospitality, and from the very inmost sources of our nature springs up that sympathy. What is that great epic poem which has filled the second place in the admiration, I had almost said in the affections, of mankind for two thousand years, but the history of an exile flying from the walls of his burning city and devoted State? Sir, the laws of nature require—the laws of nations command hospitality to those who fly from oppression and despair. And this is all that we have done, and all that we propose to do. We have invited Kossuth—we have procured his release from captivity—we have brought him here, and we propose to say to him, standing upon our shores with his eye directed to us, and while we know that the eyes of the civilized world are fixed upon him and us, "Louis Kossuth, in the name of the American people, we bid you a cordial welcome."

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that the resolution now before the Senate for consideration is that offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD.] I wish to move an amendment to it, and I do it without the slightest intention of derogating from it. I would vote for the resolution as it is, but for the purpose of facilitating its passage I move to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert, "That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait on Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, and introduce him to the Senate." This is the resolution which I offered yesterday. I will state to the honorable Senator from New York the reason that I offered this, lest it should be supposed that we are running in opposition in this case. I find in the proceedings in relation to Lafayette that a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives was appointed to make arrangements for his reception. The House committee reported—I read from the proceedings of the House—

"That they have met the committee of the Senate on that subject, and that the committees have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses that each House should receive General Lafayette in such manner as it shall deem most suitable to the occasion."

They stated at the same time, that there was no mode of receiving him jointly by the two Houses. Here are the proceedings when he was received:

"At one o'clock, General Lafayette entered the Chamber of the Senate, accompanied by the committee of that body. On entering the bar, Mr. Barbour, chairman of the committee, announced the presence of General Lafayette, in the following words: 'We introduce General Lafayette to the Senate of the United States.'"

That was the whole ceremony, and I regard it as an excellent precedent. I do not wish to delay action on the matter by any discussion. In fact, I regret that I said as much as I did say yesterday, because I think an act of courtesy should always be clothed in as few words as possible.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression that the Senator from Illinois is not at liberty to offer the amendment which he proposes. This is a joint resolution. It has been read twice and is now in Committee of the Whole. The resolution which the Senator from Illinois proposes to substitute for it is a simple resolution, which does not require the joint action of the two Houses of Congress. The Chair is therefore under the necessity of declining to receive the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHIELDS. Unfortunately I know very little of the rules; but I have understood that it was perfectly competent to move to strike out all after the word "resolved," in a resolution, and insert something else. If, however, the Senator from New York would accept this as a substitute for his resolution, I have no doubt that all difficulty would be obviated.

Mr. BERRIEN. It does appear to me that this would be an inconsistent mode of proceeding. The resolution of the Senator from New York proposes the joint action of the two Houses of Congress. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois proposes the separate action of the Senate. The two cannot go together.

The PRESIDENT. Such is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BERRIEN. It would be well, I apprehend, for the Senator from Illinois to allow the resolution of the Senator from New York to be disposed of, and then let him bring forward his proposition as a separate measure.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already said that he cannot entertain the motion to amend, as proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I rise to make a suggestion. We all have the same feelings on this subject. I imagine that the Senate will unanimously manifest a disposition to accord respect to this distinguished stranger. The main difficulty heretofore has been as to the manner in which we should act. The honorable Senator from Illinois has looked into precedents, and I think he has very satisfactorily shown that the precedent which he has brought forward is entitled to respect. It is most obvious, in the present state of things, that if those gentlemen who prefer the form sanctioned by precedent should vote against the resolution of the Senator from New York, they would be subject to be misunderstood. I therefore hope that, in the spirit of proper compromise, the Senator from New York will withdraw his resolution, and allow the other to be proposed and acted upon.

Mr. BERRIEN. I understand the Chair to have decided that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois is not in order.

The PRESIDENT. Such was the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BERRIEN. Unless that is appealed from, the question comes before the Senate upon the resolution of the Senator from New York, and upon that resolution I desire to submit some brief observations to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the honorable Senator from Georgia permit us to have this question of order determined before he proceeds any further?

Mr. BERRIEN. The question of order can only be determined by an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I beg leave to say now, in relation to the precedent which has been referred to, that that was the result of a conference of a joint committee on the part of the two Houses of Congress. They conferred, and separately reported to their respective Houses. There is no precedent, then, for the course which is now proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HALE. I would like to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BERRIEN. I believe I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Georgia that he allow the appeal to be taken.

Mr. BERRIEN. That can be done presently, when I have finished.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, I consider this entirely too grave a question to be involved in forms of proceedings. I concur with my colleague [Mr. DAWSON] in the position which he took the other day, in opposition to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] and I am opposed myself to the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] in the form in which it is presented.

But I desire to say at the outset, in order that I may not be misunderstood on this subject, that this opposition arises from no doubt as to the merits or the services of the individual whom it is proposed to honor. His services as a patriot, who has distinguished himself in the cause of civil liberty, I am willing to admit in the largest extent in which they have been asserted by his most ardent admirers. Sir, I have not been an inattentive observer of events which have occurred in Hungary, within the last three or four years. I have seen that people struggling for the achievement of their national independence, have rejoiced in their prosperity, and have sympathized in their misfortunes. I am perfectly well aware, as everybody must be who has given his attention to this subject, that that struggle was for the preservation of an ancient constitution, which operated with great inequality upon the various classes of the people; but I did not doubt that after that independence was obtained, when peace was restored, when the existence of Hungary, as an independent nation, was acquiesced in, the progress of liberal principles incident to such a struggle would have resulted in ameliorating the organic law and in giving equal rights to all classes of people. With this view of the subject, I have looked to the progress of events in Hungary with no ordinary interest. I have rejoiced in the prospect of the successful issue of that struggle, and have regretted its defeat.

I have been at all times willing to accord to this distinguished individual—I am now willing to accord to him—the merit of having contended for the advancement of the principles of civil liberty in a manner which commends him to the feelings of every friend of freedom. While, therefore, fulfilling my duty as an American Senator, I oppose this resolution, I would not pluck a single leaf from the laurel crown which, whether in triumph or adversity, should encircle the brow of the patriot who is struggling for the advancement of those principles. No, sir, that is not my purpose.

Mr. President, if this resolution be, as has been suggested, the simple expression of the feelings of the American Congress, complimentary to Governor Kossuth, why, under the circumstances in which we are now placed—engaged, as we are, in the performance of our constitutional duties, with a mass of business which will command our earnest, constant, undivided attention for months to come—why has it not occurred to Senators to consider whether, neglecting our appropriate duties, we ought to employ our time in regulating the terms of a mere idle, valueless compliment?—idle in itself, and valueless in the view of him to whom it is addressed, as we know from his repeated declarations. So considering it, that question is submitted to the individual opinion and to the individual taste of every member of the Senate.

It seems, sir, we have got to a point of time, in this system of progress, when precedents are scoffed at. We are not to look at precedents—we are to decide de novo upon existing circumstances as they arise, and to make precedents which our successors will in like manner follow, or discard at their pleasure. Sir, this is not my view. I am not willing to depart from the usages of our predecessors, unless some reason can be assigned for such departure that is satisfactory to my judgment. Such also seems to have been the view of the advocates of the resolution, for they refer to the case of the Marquis de Lafayette as a precedent to justify this proceeding. Mr. President, in the American Senate, in the highest legislative council of the Union, are we, who are reveling in the enjoyment of those liberties which this illustrious man assisted our fathers to achieve—are we to put the case which is now presented to us, in comparison with that of Lafayette? Who was that distinguished individual? What were his services? Sir, the career of Lafayette exhibits a noble patriotism unrivaled in the history of the world. Born and educated under a monarchical government, a French noble, invested with all the privileges of his rank, and accustomed to the deference which was paid to it, he forgot all the prejudices of birth and of education; surrendered the privileges of his rank; abandoned his home and his country, to come to us. He was with us and of us. He put life and fortune on the same cast with our fathers. He was their compatriot, friend, brother; and devoting himself with all the energies of his mind to the achievement of our liberties, he battled nobly in that glorious cause. When we gave him the reception which is referred to as a precedent in this case, he came not to agitate, not to advance a political principle, and not to involve us in European strife, but to revisit the scenes of his early and glorious struggles in the cause of freedom; to grasp the hands of his surviving brethren in arms, who had battled with him in the achievement of our liberties. Aye, sir, he came to view the glorious spectacle presented by the successful administration of that very government which he had risked life and fortune to establish. It was to this man, coming to us under such circumstances, that this tribute was offered. Sir, it has no parallel; it can have no parallel; it stands alone, and it should be permitted to stand alone. I would not diminish the value of the compliment which was paid to the Marquis de Lafayette, by its repetition in favor of any living man. We owed him a debt of gratitude for personal services and for pecuniary aid, which we endeavored to discharge. The personal homage which we offered was a tribute to his patriotism. We gave the reception which our feelings prompted. Sir, we look in vain to the case of the Marquis Lafayette for a precedent to the course which it is proposed to pursue on this occasion.

But if this were really and truly the mere unmeaning compliment which gentlemen seem to think it—if it were indeed a mere expression on our part of the feelings of the American people in relation to this distinguished individual, a simple welcoming to our shores, committing us to no future action—if this were truly the whole extent of the resolution that is proposed by the Senator from New York—I say again, I would refer it to the taste of individual Senators, exercising my own without troubling the Senate with the remarks which I propose to make on that branch of the subject.

Mr. President, this resolution is to be considered not merely with reference to the terms in which it is expressed, but also in its close connection with the circumstances under which it is presented. This individual, distinguished by his exertions in the effort to achieve the independence of his native country, was the victim of misfortune. Compelled to fly from his native land, he was imprisoned, or subjected to surveillance, in the dominions of Turkey. His situation and that of his associates excited our sympathy, and not merely ours alone, it arrested the attention of every portion of the civilized world where the blessings of freedom are held even in slight regard. What have we done? A great stress is laid upon the fact that we have invited him to our shores. We have not invited him alone. We have interfered for his relief and for that of his associates in captivity with the Government of Turkey, and our agency has been effectual in accomplishing that object. But our invitation was not addressed to him only; it included his associates. It was not designed as a mere compliment to Mr. Kossuth. It was intended as the expression of our sympathy with a band of gallant patriots who had struggled and fallen in the effort to achieve the independence of their country. Again, sir: for what purpose did we invite him here? Is it doubted by those to whom I address myself that the object and purpose of that invitation was to afford to these Hungarian patriots, who were then imprisoned, an asylum in our country? We dispatched a national vessel for the purpose of securing their safe transit across the ocean. We have brought them here, and in my judgment, if they were disposed to remain, we have imposed upon ourselves the obligation to afford them an asylum in our land, and the means of enjoying that asylum in comfort. The moment they touched our shores they were under the protection of our laws. Beyond that, we have perhaps imposed upon ourselves the obligation to provide them the means of comfortable subsistence, and ultimately of achieving an independence for themselves. But looking to the public declarations of Mr. Kossuth, we know that this is not his object; that he does not come to seek an asylum here. No, sir; he comes here for the purpose of propagating a political principle; to assert the right of the people of every nation to regulate their own affairs, uncontrolled by the action of any foreign power; and to ask from this Government a pledge that it will aid him, not merely by moral, but by physical force, if it becomes necessary, in any future struggle in Hungary, to enforce and establish that principle.

The consideration which I am disposed to give to this subject, the gravity of the question presented to us, arises therefore from the fact, patent on the face of the proceedings exhibited to us—that Mr. Kossuth expects from us, from the American Government, voluntarily—of their own accord, if they will—and if not, from the American people, acting upon the American Government, under the excitement produced by his narrative of Hungarian wrongs, a similar result—a pledge that they will so far interfere in the contest about, as he states, to be renewed in Hungary, as to say to every foreign power: "You must abstain from all interposition. The people of Hungary have the right to establish the principles of their own government. They are engaged in a contest with the power of Austria. You must not interfere. We hold this to be the principle which our position in the civilized world requires us to maintain." We are to become the champion of this principle, and, in union with Great Britain, we are to say to the Emperor of Russia: "Stand off! If you attempt to interpose in this contest between Hungary and Austria, we shall feel bound to render such interposition fruitless." Is this a fair interpretation of the facts which are before the public? I ask, without quoting them, a reference to the speeches of Mr. Kossuth, delivered in various places in Europe—to the speech of a distinguished citizen of our own country in England—to the sentiments avowed by an American official there—and to various declarations made by Mr. Kossuth since his arrival on our shores.

Now, what is the position in which he places this matter? He says to you, The expression of your sympathies—of that feeling which is natural to every freeman—is grateful to the Hungarian; but the expression of your sympathy is valueless; it can do us no good. Our necessities require that the expression of sympathy should be followed by some efficient act on your part. I am a plain man, he says; I am now here where I am free to speak, and I tell you that I come to ask the aid of your Government to secure to my countrymen the enforcement of the principle, that no foreign power shall be permitted to interfere in the contest which we shall wage with Austria for the establishment of our independence. Sir, if gentlemen have read the speech of the distinguished American citizen in Europe, to whom I have referred, they have seen distinctly avowed this proposition.

There is about to be convulsion in Europe. A league of despots have combined for the purpose of destroying all republican governments; and the question proposed is, Shall we wait until, isolated and alone, we are compelled to arrest their aggressions? or shall we unite ourselves with the only really free Government on the other side of the Atlantic, and announce, in advance, our determination to maintain the principles for which Mr. Kossuth contends? In express language, it is said in the speech to which I have referred, that England and the United States, looking to their mercantile and naval marine, command the ocean; that they have it in their power to blockade the ports of these despotic powers, if it be necessary, or if not necessary, to place their vessels at the mouths of the harbors of their different ports; and to repeat the operation which was practised by our own Government upon Mexico during our war with that Power; to levy duties on vessels entering those ports, and in that way to destroy their commerce.

I refer to these details not for the purpose of commenting upon them; not of expressing an opinion as to their efficiency, still less to intimate any opinion of the correctness of their avowal; but simply to show that it is not your sympathy which Mr. Kossuth asks. It is not public honors to himself which he seeks. No, sir, he comes here to obtain from you a pledge to enforce the principle, that no foreign Power shall be permitted to interfere between the Hungarian people and the Austrian Government in the event of a renewal of the contest. Are we prepared to give that pledge? Whence do we derive our authority? We have in these two Chambers the right to exercise all legislative power which is conferred by the Constitution; and among these powers is that of declaring war. Have we the power, under circumstances like the present, to pledge this Government irredeemably, to a course of action which may lead to war, and which must, in all human probability, have that result?

I do not know what estimate is formed of the character of the Emperor of Russia: it has not been a subject of my study. But I can imagine that if anything could arouse the feelings of an individual to resistance against such interference as is proposed, it would be the announcement of the principles that we, to them a trans-Atlantic Power—a free people who have hitherto declared that, while maintaining the principles of freedom within our own limits, we abstain absolutely and entirely from all interference with any other Government—may more, that we will allow (as some are disposed to assert) no interference of any European Power in the affairs of this Continent,—if any circumstance, I say, could arouse the feelings of the individual who is at the head of the Russian Empire to a degree which must inevitably result in war, it would be the course which it is now proposed to pursue. That this course is contrary to the settled policy of the Government from its foundation, I think no one will be disposed to deny. Our Presidents and our Congresses have not hesitated to express, in times past, their devotion to the principle of civil liberty. They will not hesitate now. But from the time of General Washington's Farewell Address to the American people, down to the present moment, the principle of avoiding entangling alliances with other nations—such as that which I think must be the inevitable result of the progress of these proceedings, if they should be adopted—the principle of avoiding all interference with the disturbances or convulsions of Europe, has been uniformly and emphatically avowed.

I desire to ascertain from the American Senate—according to the individual whom it is intended to honor, on this occasion, all the merit which his most enthusiastic admirers may be disposed to claim for him—whether they are disposed to depart from that principle of policy by adopting a measure which, in my judgment, necessarily involves that departure?

We are told of the interpretation which the civilized world has given to the mere act of invitation which has been extended to this individual and his associates, by sending for them a national vessel; and if, after the avowals he has made in England; if, after the declarations of the distinguished American citizen to whom I have referred, and which Mr. Kossuth says expresses all his feelings and all his desires; if he after the declarations which Kossuth has made after landing on our shores; the distinction which he has drawn between the Government and the people; his avowal of a determination to appeal to the people for the active sympathy which he invokes in behalf of his country; if after all this, which is perfectly known to us, the Congress of the United States, representing the thirty-one sovereign States of this Union, and the twenty-five millions of people which compose it, shall welcome him to the shores of the United States in this formal manner, do they not thereby impliedly acquiesce in the object which he thus publicly and in advance announces that he came here to accomplish? Is not that the very interpretation which the civilized world will give it? He says to the American people—and the declaration is before us while we are agitating the question:

"I do not come here to ask your sympathy. That is gratifying, but valueless. I come here to invoke the aid of the great American Republic to protect my people, peaceably, if they may, by the moral influence of their declarations, but forcibly if they must, by the physical power of their arm—to prevent any foreign interference in the struggle about to be renewed for the liberties of my country. I am a plain man. I am in a land of freedom. I am permitted to speak freely my sentiments. This is what I ask. If this is accorded to me, I go home, and the liberties not merely of Hungary but of Europe, are secured. If not, I go with my countrymen alone to renew that struggle for the achievement of our liberties."

This language is too distinct to be mistaken. If this resolution passes, extending to him alone—(departing from your invitation, for that included his associates)—the welcome which it proposes, after these declarations of the object for which he comes here, the civilized world will be much more authorized than they were by the invitation which has been referred to by the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] to conclude that the welcome to Governor Kossuth implies a pledge that we will interpose, if necessary, and in the manner he desires, for the protection of the Hungarian nation. In my judgment this inference is irresistible; and if it be not, yet if it occasion doubt; if it result in producing opposition to this resolution in its present form; if gentlemen do believe (and I doubt not that they are sincere in the declaration) that this is a mere testimonial of the respect and good will of the people of the United States toward a distinguished advocate of the cause of civil liberty, they will not hesitate to accept the amendment which I shall submit, and which is simply calculated to exclude this conclusion. I desire, in the first place, by the amendment which I shall propose, to fulfill the expectations which were reasonably created by the invitation, by extending this resolution to the associates of Governor Kossuth. The interposition of the American Government in behalf of these captives was not confined to that individual alone: it extended to all his associates in captivity. The invitation to our shores equally embraced them all. If, therefore, we are acting in fulfillment of the obligations created by that invitation, we must not confine the resolution to Governor Kossuth, but must extend it to his associates. To him and to them, to the full extent of my constitutional powers, I am willing to afford an asylum within the limits of the United States, and to provide all the means of making that asylum comfortable. But I should be unfaithful to my duty as an American Senator, according to the convictions of my judgment, if I suffered any zeal for the advancement of the principle of civil liberty on the other side of the Atlantic to induce me to jeopard the safety and the vital interests of the country which is my own; to which I owe my first, entire, and absolute allegiance. I am unwilling, therefore, to leave it to implication, that by this reception, under these circumstances, we have entered into a pledge that by the exertion of moral, and, if necessary, of physical force, we will protect the people of Hungary from all foreign interference upon the renewal of their struggle. Such a pledge once given would be irrevocable. It could not be violated without dishonor. It could not be redeemed without putting in jeopardy the best and most vital interests of our country.

These are the views which I entertain on this subject, and, in accordance with them, I propose to amend the resolution by adding to it the following:

"And be it further resolved, That the welcome thus afforded to Louis Kossuth be extended to his associates who have landed on our shores; but while welcoming these Hungarian patriots to an asylum in our country, and to the protection which our laws do, and always will afford to them, it is due to candor to declare that it is not the purpose of Congress to depart from the settled policy of this Government which forbids all interference with the domestic concerns of other nations."

Mr. HALE. I am desirous that the resolution shall pass, but I am not so desirous that this resolution shall pass that I am willing, in order to obtain that, to resign what I believe to be any of the privileges of a Senator. With great deference to the Chair, I look upon its decision as being in contravention of that right; and before I sit down I intend to take an appeal, and quote authority from the Manual, which I think sustains me. I refer to the decision that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] to the resolution of the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] is out of order. But before I proceed to do this, I wish to say a word or two upon that question in the aspect in which it is now presented; and I beg leave to assure the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE] that I use words with no sectional, no hidden, no sinister meaning. I will endeavor to use as pure English as I can collect, and use English in the acceptance which it has as far South as civilization extends, and without any qualifications at all.

I am desirous that the resolution shall pass, and I am so desirous that it shall pass that I shall interpose no amendment, because the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] thinks that, on a former occasion, an amendment which I had the honor to propose operated very fatally upon the resolution which he introduced. My own opinion is, that the amendment lost strength by being tacked on to his resolution; and if I had introduced it as an original measure it would have passed. But to come to this resolution. I want to speak to what seems to me to be a great objection to it, and that is, that it wants precedent.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator gave notice that he was about to appeal from the decision of the Chair. If the debate goes on, he will be too late to take an appeal. The decision of the Chair is considered as acquiesced in, unless an appeal is immediately taken. When the Senator from Georgia rose, the Chair requested him to give way in order that an appeal might be taken. But the Chair will still receive the appeal; though, if the discussion goes on, it will be too late to take an appeal.

Mr. HALE. Yielding to the wishes of the friends of the resolution around me, I will not take an appeal, but I hope this decision will not be taken as a precedent. I deem it wrong; but I shall submit to the wrong for the present, for the purpose of getting to a greater good, and that is, the consideration of this resolution. I want to address myself to the objection that this resolution wants precedent. It is said that the only precedent which can be found was the case of the reception given to the Marquis de Lafayette. A very eloquent eulogy was passed on the sacrifices and services which that distinguished individual made in the attainment of the liberties of this country, which entitled him to the reception which he received when he visited our shores, something more than a quarter of a century since. Now, I want to take this very case of Lafayette, and see if it is not a case in point. I ask you, sir, if, when the idea was first suggested to the mind of Lafayette that here was to him a trans-Atlantic people—an ocean wider, for all practical purposes, by thousands of miles, than than now, was between him and this trans-Atlantic people, who had risen up with the energy of freemen and were asserting their rights, and struggling to maintain the declaration which they had made—if Lafayette, instead of acting with that noble and disinterested chivalry with which he threw himself into the contest without waiting to see whether fortunate or adverse circumstances attended those who were struggling here—if, instead of obeying the generous impulses of his own nature, he had begun to study the musty records of the monarchy of France to find a precedent, how long would it have been before he would have thrown his fortunes and his life into the scale in which he ventured his all? Sir, many, many centuries would have elapsed before he would have found a precedent for the course which he then took. He found that precedent by the occasion, and the occasion made the precedent.

Another word as to precedents, as applicable to us. What has been the history of the United States? Why, instead of following precedents, they have been making precedents.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Presidents.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator from Mississippi says we have been making Presidents. I suppose the word precedents sounds so much like presidents, that the Senator from Mississippi cannot hear it without its calling up some other associations than those, as the only ones which belong to the occasion.

Mr. FOOTE. I would simply say, that knowing that the gentleman himself had at one time aspirations for the Presidency, I thought it possible that that was in his mind when he made use of the word; particularly as I understood him distinctly to pronounce the word presidents.

Mr. HALE. In dictionaries, and precedents, and pronunciation, I yield to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] but in nothing else. I think it is a little ungenerous in the Senator from Mississippi, who comes here from fields in which he has so successfully combated those who opposed his claims—who comes here with plumed cap full of triumph, not to enjoy the blushing honors with which his State has crowned him, without a fling at my poor claims, which were so long ago rejected. I ask him if, while those honors are heaped upon him, he cannot remember Mordecai the Jew, sitting at the King's gate? I had hoped that prosperity would have brought better lessons with it, but it seems it has not. I leave the subject.

I say, that it has been the province and destiny of the United States not only to make Presidents but precedents. I believe that, when the members of the Continental Congress assembled on the 4th of July, 1776, and put forth the declaration which they have put forth to the world, they were acting entirely without a precedent; that a precedent is not to be found in which the representatives of a vast number of States had come together in peaceful conclave, and in solemn and mature deliberation come to the conclusion that it was a dictate of duty to separate the connections which had heretofore bound them to their mother country. Then they were acting without precedent. And after the justice of that declaration was vindicated by a seven years' war, the experience of a few succeeding years of peace had told them that peace itself might become valueless without something to render those blessings permanent and valuable, they assembled together in a convention which framed our Constitution, and they were then acting entirely without precedent. I believe you may search the world, and you cannot find an instance in which the representatives of a nation came together in that manner, and formed a written constitution. It was the second written constitution, I think, which the history of the world, up to that period, presented, and the first was that formed on board the Mayflower, when the Pilgrims were on their way from Delft-haven to this country. That was a matter without precedent, and so the history of our country has been without precedent. Instead of following in the vestiges which have been left us of nations gone before us, we have been following the destiny which seems to be ours—been making, instead of following precedents. And such, I trust, we shall continue to do.

In regard to this resolution of sympathy, respect, or condolence, or whatever it may be, with Kossuth, what is to be the effect of it? Some gentlemen may think that it looks to something ulterior, but it does not of itself include anything of that sort. It does not bind the people of this country to anything. It is simply the expression of what I believe the whole people feel—sympathy with Kossuth. They look upon him as the living representative of a great principle which has been the idol of their affections. They look upon him as the vindicator, in the struggles which he has sustained in his own country, of those great sentiments which are dear to the whole American people, and impressed upon the whole American heart. It is because the people of this country look upon him as the representative of these principles, and see in him the living embodiment of that which is dearest to their own affections. They desire in the most solemn form in which the action of the people or the Government of the United States can do it, an expression of those feelings to be given to the distinguished individual who has thus come to our shores.

And, sir, shall the American people hesitate, shall they pause, shall they be afraid to give utterance in the most formal, the most solemn, and the most effective manner in which they can do it, to the sentiments which the great body of the people entertain? If we are to pause before we give utterance to sentiments like these, until we think that they will fail to give offence to any of the other Governments of the world, we might as well abandon at once the idea of carrying out the principles which are embodied in the Constitution under which we are organized to-day. I have no doubt that the very formation of that Constitution, the very embodiment of the sentiments upon which the Constitution is founded, embraced in the Declaration of Independence, gave offence at the moment of their promulgation, and give offence now, and will continue to give offence to the latest period of time, to the despots of the Old World and of the New. They will never be pleasing; they will never be palatable to them. If the people and the Government of the United States are to pause and reckon and calculate how the expression and utterance of their sentiments may be made palatable and void of offence to those who entertain directly contrary sentiments, we might as well at once close our mouths in eternal silence.

It is because the utterance of these sentiments will give offence to those who are always offended whenever the sentiments of liberty are uttered, that they have value. It is because they will testify to the victims of oppression everywhere that there is a feeling of sympathy, of commiseration, of condolence, and of respect in the whole American people with them in their misfortunes—it is because of this that this resolution has any value.

If you stop to fortify it with provisos and qualifications, and reservations and exclusions of conclusions, it may be a very good special plea, but it will be a very poor channel through which the sympathies are to find vent—to find utterance and expression. No, sir; let the expression of these sentiments be broad and manly, open, unqualified, and direct. Let them speak in the plainest manner in which the English language can present ideas, the sentiment which to-day is beating and vibrating through the hearts of the whole American people. Let the bearings and uprisings of the great American heart, which has been moved by the advent of this man, as it has not been moved for more than a quarter of a century, find a corresponding movement and expression here from the representatives of the nation in this Congress assembled.

Let us not be afraid that there is any danger of compromising or committing ourselves to any step which we may need hereafter to retrace or retract. It was said by a distinguished American statesman, on another occasion, that he took no step backwards. Such, I trust, will be the language of the American Senate and American people—that they will take no backward step. They have planted their banners. They are unfurled. They have written their sentiments where the world may read them, and where, I trust in God, all time will not efface them. Let it never be said to the victims of despotism in the Old World, that are straining their aching eyes and looking with throbbing hearts to hear what the only free people on the face of the whole earth will do, that we have hesitated, halted, furled our banners, lest our views, if repeated and reiterated by us, might give offence to those to whom the principles of liberty are always an offence. I trust that, instead of going back—instead of retrograding—instead of pausing—we will make this resolution more full and more explicit. If it wants more meaning, put it into it. We do not, by such a course as this, commit ourselves to anything and everything which somebody may have said: but we do commit ourselves to principles of fidelity to the great cause which lies at the bottom of our Revolution and is embodied in the principles of our Constitution. I trust that we are prepared to go as far as that. As I am desirous that the resolution shall pass, I will not trespass longer on the Senate, but will give way, hoping that we may arrive at early action.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, I desire, at this point of the debate, while the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is before the Senate, to say a few words. Three months ago, the object of this resolution was a prisoner in Turkey. Driven from his own country, forsaken by every Christian nation in Europe, the diplomacy of this country, actuated by a high and Christian spirit, sought him out, and tendered to him a national ship, in which he was brought to this country, under the flag of the Union. When he landed on the shores of this continent, he received, as he is now receiving, the sympathies of millions of freemen. Who was it that attracted the attention and the sympathies of this country? It was Louis Kossuth, the exile, not Louis Kossuth, the Governor of Hungary. It was not Kossuth, the successful hero and statesman, but the deserted and the unfortunate Kossuth, to whom we extended our liberality and our courtesy. In the spirit of the resolution which we passed at the last session, asking our Executive to interfere in a peaceful and a quiet way, by diplomacy, he was rescued from his imprisonment and placed upon our shores as an exile. In that spirit I am willing to receive him, and in that spirit the American heart is willing to receive him. It is not to Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, that this resolution and the amendment of the Senator from Georgia extends. We receive him not with a crest upon his helmet, and sword and spear, not as Caesar clothed in armor, but as Cato in his gown, as the great Apostle of Liberty, coming here after having been driven from his native land, seeking that liberty upon our shores which, with all his exertions, he could not obtain at home.

It is a common fashion to glorify the successful and conquering hero. But it is no common fashion for a great nation to seek the deserted and the weak and the down-trodden, and to award to them their sympathies and cordial greetings. I confess that I consider it one of the proudest chapters in the history of American diplomacy, where it interferes not by armed force, but by the great influence which is gathered around this country of liberty and law, to take from the dungeons of Turkey a man who had been trodden down by the despots of Europe, and without interfering with the rights of any, placed him at liberty and brought him here to this Western world, where he can enjoy the rights and privileges of a freeman.

The resolution of the Senator from New York does nothing more than to bid him welcome to this country in the name of the people. I should have preferred that resolution, had it not been for certain matters which have transpired since the landing of this distinguished individual upon our shores. In the first speech which he made on landing in New York, at Castle Garden, a speech prepared with great care, he declares, with the manly straight forwardness of an honest man, what he wants. He says that it is not merely our sympathies that he looks for, but that he wants pecuniary means and political aid, and nothing less. He asks for all the sinews of war—money, men, and political power. It is said that he has not asked this of the Government, but he has asked it of the people. What is this Government but the mouth-piece of a free people; and when this Government speaks to strangers and speaks to the world, it is the people of the country that speak in the language uttered by the Government. That is the great glory of our Republican institutions.

This distinguished man asks us—the people of this country—to go to war on the Continent of Europe, by money, men, and political influence, for the cause of human liberty there. Now, no man desires more than I do, that the great cause of civil and religious liberty should succeed upon the Continent of Europe; and I believe, judging from the signs of the times, the day is not far distant when, by reason of the influences which have been cast back upon that Continent from this country, by means of the continual and intimate social intercourse between that country and this, by means of emigration and reémigration, by the peaceful and quiet influence of this country, Europe is to be regenerated. But if we listen to this cry of armed interference, and if the people of this country are to go with men and money to fight the battles of liberty on the Continent of Europe, then we at once put an end to that wise policy which we have practised from the days of Washington to this hour; and instead of the influence of this country being exercised as it has been heretofore exercised, armed force, and war, and blood is to determine whether Europe is to be free or not. In my humble opinion, the first American gun discharged upon the Continent of Europe, in defence of a revolution in Europe, will be more disastrous to the cause of human liberty than all the batteries of all the despots in the world.

Sir, it is said that we have a great mission to perform: that it is our duty to interfere, not only by the expression of sympathy, but in some other way which gentlemen do not exactly define, in the cause of distressed humanity in Europe. We have a great trust to execute, and a great duty to perform; but, like every other trust and every other duty, domestic, social, and political, it is limited; it has its errand. If we go beyond that—if we turn crusaders for the purpose of executing that trust and performing that duty in other lands, like all crusaders we may get great honor, we may be renowned in chivalry and in song, but we shall neglect the great duties which we have to perform at home, where we can perform them to the advantage of mankind.

The altar of our liberty has its own temple. It is here. Here let the oppressed of every land come to worship. Here let them come if they desire to get rid of oppression at home or to warm their patriotism to return to renewed efforts abroad. Let them come; but let us not take away that altar from our own temple and carry it off into the wilderness of European Revolution, there to be taken by the Philistines, or its fires to be quenched forever beneath an ocean of blood. No, sir; it is here that our duty is to be performed.

I have felt it my duty to make these remarks, because I intend to carry out the resolution of Congress which was passed at the last session, and to give to Louis Kossuth and his companions in exile, a hearty, a noble, and a generous welcome to this country. I care not as to the form of this welcome. While I am willing to do that, I wish it at the same time to be understood that I acknowledge none of these new doctrines which have been started, that we are to implicate ourselves in the affairs of Europe. I wish it also to be distinctly understood, that I do not agree with the doctrine of cutting off this nation from all social and international intercourse with Europe. I am not, in the language of the Senator from Michigan, for cutting the string. We have a duty to perform in this respect. I am for keeping up legal and international intercourse through diplomacy with all the nations of the earth, and maintaining friendly and social relations with them. I would not forsake Austria because of Austrian despotism. I would not forsake Russia because she is denounced to be a despotic power. Among the proudest nations of Europe, alongside of the highest and oldest flag, should our flag be sustained; not by war, but this great nation should be represented there by some of her patriotic and intelligent citizens. In the darkest days of the struggle for human liberty there I would maintain the influence of this Government; not for the purpose of interfering by armed force, but to hold out to the unfortunate and oppressed of those nations, if they cannot after all their exertions maintain liberty there, our flag and our influence will afford them a home here.

A word more, and I have done. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia does not at all, as I see, change the resolution offered by the Senator from New York. It merely avoids a conclusion which might be drawn from the passage by the Congress of the United States of a resolution in such general terms. The resolution with the amendment shall have my hearty concurrence. I, too, have not been an inattentive observer of the history and conduct of this distinguished individual. I admire his talents and patriotism. I believe him to be a man who has devoted himself not to any wild scheme of liberty in Hungary, but to the establishment of constitutional government and liberty for the benefit of his people. As such I shall personally greet Louis Kossuth cordially, and also as a representative of one of the States of this Union.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this debate, and if any gentleman wishes to discuss the resolution, I shall give way to him. I intend simply to put myself right before the country in regard to this matter. I introduced the original resolution, as I have already stated, at the instance of the Secretary of State, and, as declared to me by him, and doubtless truly, with the sanction of the Administration itself, it being the opinion of the President and his Cabinet, as clearly intimated in the last annual message, that it was the duty of Congress, under all the circumstances existing, to provide a suitable reception for the distinguished personage whose character and actions have been the subject of such extended remarks on this occasion. I acted, I say again, at the instance of gentlemen of high official standing in Washington, with whom after full consultation, I had the good fortune to agree. I am willing to acknowledge, that in none of the conversations which I held on this subject, preliminary to introducing the original resolution, did any person undertake to intimate the propriety of so demeaning ourselves in the discussion of the question designed to be presented to the Senate, as to avoid enkindling the resentment of the Emperor of Russia. Had any such consideration been suggested to me, I should have felt not a little dissatisfaction with the personage in whose brain an idea so ignoble had arisen. I understood the resolution before us to be simply a proposition to afford to Governor Kossuth, on account of the high respect which we entertain for his public character, and the ardent sympathy which the freemen of this country must naturally feel for him, and the noble cause with which he stands identified, a reception cordial and respectful on the part of the two Houses of Congress in the first instance, to be followed, as has been generally anticipated, by an additional reception on the part of the Executive of the Republic. I now regret exceedingly having withdrawn the original resolution, because it might, perhaps, have been acted upon before the present time. I withdrew it for reasons satisfactory to me, and which I stated in the hearing of the Senate. I supposed that it would be impossible for us, in consequence of the unexpected opposition presented in various quarters of this Hall, to act on the resolution brought forward by me in time to accord to Governor Kossuth that reception which I had hoped all the members of this body would have supposed to be due to him. Since that period, some delay having occurred in New York with regard to his public reception there, other gentlemen here, friendly to the original object which I had in view, have thought proper to introduce propositions to provide for him a respectful and affectionate reception in the capital of the nation.

Was there anything in the original resolution—is there anything in either of the resolutions which have been presented to the Senate since the withdrawal of the original one, which indicates an intention, on the part of those who have agreed that this illustrious personage is entitled to some respectful notice at our hands, of a nature to commit the Government to all the uncertainties and perils of a European war? No calmly-thinking and dispassionate man can examine any of the propositions presented, and come to such a conclusion. I do not understand the language of Governor Kossuth in New York as the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] and some others, seem to understand it. I do not understand him at all as intimating an expectation that this Government, as such, should enter into a war at once without delay, for the maintenance of the independence of Hungary. I understand him—and the gentleman from Georgia, in one part of his speech seemed so to understand him—as clearly asserting a distinction between the people of the United States and their Government. That distinction was intimated by him, not in any spirit of hostility toward our institutions—not for the purpose of exhibiting any disrespect on his part towards the Government, or intimating any doubt in his mind as to the sincere sympathy which the Government of the United States entertains for him and his fortunes. The contrary idea is most emphatically stated by him. I understand him to appeal, as he has a right to do, to this nation of sovereigns, every man of whom is equally and completely independent, for the calm and dispassionate consideration of that claim to respect and sympathy which he has come here to present to them. Has he not a right to address public meetings of our citizens in behalf of the cause of Hungarian freedom and independence? Have not our people a right to listen to him respectfully—to avow their respect and affectionate sympathy for him, and to supply him with such pecuniary aid as he may be willing to receive? Have they not a right to do anything for the furtherance of the cause which he has at heart, which is not of a nature calculated to compromise our international relations, or involve us in foreign wars?

I maintain that he has said nothing at all in any of his speeches that I have seen which goes beyond this. I know that certain slanderous prints have asserted that he has employed language of a very different character. I know that in advance of his coming the most unmanly and illiberal efforts were made to poison the public mind in regard to him and his claims to our admiration and kindness. I have looked into this matter pretty closely, and I feel justified in asserting that great and cruel injustice has been done to this distinguished individual in regard to what he said in the city of New York. What is it that is now proposed? One gentleman simply urges substantially that we shall give to Governor Kossuth a hearty national welcome. Is there any harm in that? But it is said there is no precedent for this; and again it is answered that a precedent has been discovered. Then it is said that the precedent found does not apply, because Lafayette was a greater man than Kossuth, or had greater claims upon our regard. Both of them were men, I believe. Both were illustrious men. Both were champions of freedom. Both had suffered in maintaining this cause. It is true, Lafayette was not Kossuth, and Kossuth is not Lafayette; but no one can deny that the character of each is such as naturally to command the respect of a nation of freemen.

We have said already, by a resolution adopted nearly a year ago, that Kossuth was entitled to our special sympathy. I undertake to assert, therefore, that the precedent established in the case of Lafayette is applicable in all its material bearings to this case. I do not care very much, though, about precedent in such a case. This is in some degree a question of common sense, and still more a question of manly feeling—a question to some extent also involving our character as supporters of Republican institutions. I was not prepared to hear it said, or even insinuated here, that we should shudder with alarm in the performance of what we may consider a high moral duty to the cause of freedom, on account of the danger which is supposed to exist of our offending his High Mightiness, the Czar of Russia. I am resolved to perform what I deem my duty as an American Senator, and to risk all consequences; and I shall respect the government of this Republic far less than I now do when it shall fail to perform its clear public duty from dread of the censure or condemnation of any of the despotic powers of Christendom. I fear that there has been too much of this feeling in our national councils in times past; and I am sure that we have arrived at a period when it becomes us to express our opinions of public men and of Governments with more freedom and boldness than has heretofore been usually practised by men in power.

We owe, as I believe, to the illustrious Governor of Hungary, a cordial national reception. Can any one pretend that such reception would violate the laws of nations? No one has pretended that it would. What right, then, would the Emperor of Russia have to complain of it? Is it disrespectful to him to treat a man, who is, in the judgment of the civilized world, possessed of higher moral attributes than any reigning monarch, with special respect and even with reverential homage? If this potentate could feel insulted at an act on our part so becoming, so natural, and should be silly enough to complain of it, he would expose himself to the laughter and contempt of the civilized world, and I should rejoice that his proud and callous heart had been made to feel the softening influence of chagrin and mortification for once in his life.

I must confess that I greatly prefer the proposition of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] and but for the extraordinary desire felt by the honorable Senator from Georgia to gratify the American public with his views in extenso on this subject, the resolution of the Senator from Illinois might have been accepted by the Senator from New York as a substitute for his, and there would have been an end of the matter. The performance of such an act as that indicated by the resolution of the Senator from Illinois, would not have affected our peaceful relations with the Governments of Europe. How is it possible that any mischief can possibly arise from our being introduced to Governor Kossuth in our own Hall, and the other members and the Government performing the rites of hospitality in such manner as they deem appropriate and becoming? Sir, I deeply deplore this whole debate. I must say that I think it is calculated to detract somewhat from the dignity of the Government itself. Comparisons have been indulged, and parallels attempted to be run which, whilst they testified some ingenuity of a rather trivial and worthless character, are not at all in unison, as I must think, either with the rules of good breeding or the laws of sound taste.

Mr. SUMNER next obtained the floor, but gave way to—

Mr. RUSK, on whose motion the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 9, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHAPLAINS.

[A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that that body had passed a resolution to authorize the election of Chaplains, that it had appointed a Committee on Printing, and on Engrossed Bills, &c.]

Mr. CARTER. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the resolution of the Senate in relation to the election of Chaplains.

There being no objection,
The resolution of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That two Chaplains be appointed during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I do not intend to detain the House by a speech upon this resolution; but being opposed to its adoption, and to the election of the officers it proposes—first, upon the ground that we have no authority to do so; and secondly, that it is a burlesque upon the Christian religion, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CARTER. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HENN. I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution, providing that the Chaplains shall receive no compensation out of the public Treasury.

The SPEAKER. No amendment can now be offered.

Mr. HENN. I give notice of the amendment I wish to offer, and ask leave that it be read.

Mr. FOWLER. I object to the reading.

The CHAIR. Objection is made, and the amendment cannot be read.

The question was then taken upon Mr. JONES's motion, and there were—yeas 22, nays 169; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, W. Allen, Beale, Bragg, Joseph Cable, Chastain, Cobb, Edgerton, Ficklin, Gaylord, Grow, Isham G. Harris, Henn, Hibbard, James Johnson, George W. Jones, McCorkle, McMullin, Phelps, Robinson, Smith, and Toombs—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Charles Allen, Allison, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Barrere, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bennett, Bibbighaus, Bissell, Bocoock, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Conger, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Eastman, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Gorman, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John H. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Geo. G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McDonald, McLaughlin, McNair, McQueen, Meacham, Miller, Millson, Minter, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Polk, Rantoul, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Scoury, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Wilcox, Wildrick, Woodward, and Yates—169.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HENN. I now offer the following amendment to the resolution:

Provided, That said Chaplain shall receive no compensation out of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. EVANS demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being first on the amendment—
Mr. HENN called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question now being on concurring in the Senate's resolution—

Mr. HENN asked leave to be excused from voting.

There being no objection, he was accordingly excused.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

THE ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House proceed forthwith to the execution of the order just made.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Nominations are now in order for the office of Chaplain. Whereupon the following nominations were made, viz:

By Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania—Rev. R. W. Cushman, of the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BRIGGS—Rev. R. R. Gurley, of the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WALBRIDGE—Rev. Dr. Wisner, of New York.

By Mr. PRICE—Rev. C. D. Westbrook, of New York.

The question being put, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. PRICE gave notice of a motion for leave to introduce bills of the following titles:

A bill amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts," approved July 23d, 1850; and

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for carrying the mails between Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, the port of New York, and Galway, or such other port as may be selected on the west coast of Ireland.

Mr. WALSH gave notice of his intention to offer a bill to enable the heirs of deceased officers and soldiers who in their lifetime held land certificates not located, to locate the same in their own names.

Also, a bill to make the counterfeiting of land warrants a criminal offence.

Mr. DOTY gave notice of his intention to introduce the following:

"Joint resolution tendering a welcome to Louis Kossuth, and making an appropriation to defray the expenses of his reception by the President."

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, gave notice that he will, on some future day, ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels."

By Mr. PHELPS: A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3d, 1849.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of William A. Christian, praying to be allowed certain payments made to officers on board the United States steamer Princeton.

Also, the petition of Daniel S. Anderson, praying an allowance of prize money due his father, Thomas O. Anderson, one of the captors of the frigate Philadelphia.

By Mr. PORTER: The petition and papers of Thomas Allen, of St. Louis, Missouri, asking compensation for printing done by order of the State Department.

Also, the memorial of R. H. Griffith, L. P. Hallack, Parker Dudley, Benjamin Davis, and James F. Mahan, the late and present register and receiver at Palmyra, Missouri, asking compensation for locating military bounty land warrants.

By Mr. CABELL, of Florida: The petition of John G. Gamble, Frederick Class, James A. D. Lawrence, Captain John Phillips, and others; Captain William Black and others; John G. Smith, Alexander Watson, Jeremiah Wingate, the heirs of John Slaughter, heirs of Lieutenant John Gregg, Charles Reeder, Benjamin Holland, and Mastrojny & Farrally.

Mr. MEACHAM asked leave to withdraw from the files of the House, and refer to the committees, the following papers: Vermont volunteers in the battle of Plattsburg, Rodman Chapman, Rebecca Funnun, Sylvanus Blodgett, Joseph Johnson, Samuel Page, and Emanuel P. Stedman.

By Mr. BUSBY: The petition and accompanying papers in relation to the claim of Andrew H. Patterson, of Ohio, asking payment for certain mail bags made for the Post Office Department.

By Mr. DOTY: The petition of General William Blake for his back pension, and for an increase of the pension now received by him.

By Mr. STUART: The petition of certain Hollanders, citizens of the State of Michigan, asking an appropriation for the improvement of Black Lake Harbor, on Lake Michigan, in said State.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 10, 1851.

Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives concur in the resolution of the Senate for the election of two Chaplains to Congress, one by each House, and have elected the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN, Chaplain on their part.

The House of Representatives have appointed, in pursuance of the joint rules of the two Houses, the following committees on their part:

On the Library—Mr. CHANDLER of Pennsylvania, Mr. WOODWARD of South Carolina, and Mr. MANN of Massachusetts.

On Enrolled Bills—Mr. WILDRICK of New Jersey, and Mr. BARRETT, of Ohio.

PETITIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hold in my hand the petition of William L. Merideth, who represents himself to be the son, and perhaps the only child and heir, of Major William Merideth, who was an officer in the army of the Revolution. He avails himself of the example set by the Congress of the United States, in the case of Miss Charlotte Lynch, to present this petition to Congress. I will not read about the sufferings of his father in the Revolution; it is sufficient to say that he was a soldier from its commencement to its end. He "states that his father received his commutation of five years' full pay, in lieu of the half pay promised him by his country for life. That he was reluctantly forced to this by a law to which he was no party, and by the necessity which the privations and losses of war had entailed upon him. He lived until the 23d February, 1833, (on which day he died,) a period so long that his half pay for life would have quadrupled the amount he received for his commutation. Your petitioner is rejoiced to see, that in a recent case—the case of Miss Charlotte Lynch—your honorable body has at length recognized the great rule of justice, as applicable to your revolutionary ancestors, that they are not to be deprived of the benefits of a contract to which they were a party, and which they sealed with their blood, by the provisions of a law to which they were no party at all," &c. He goes on to say that he hopes that Congress will mete out to him the same justice which was meted to Miss Charlotte Lynch, and allow him the difference between the half pay and commutation pay, which would now amount in his case to some twenty or thirty thousand dollars. I hope Congress will see the propriety of doing equal justice to all its citizens; and that Mr. Merideth's memorial may be referred, without further reading, to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and that they will take it into their special consideration. I will state that I will furnish to the committee, from the Pension Office, the evidences of Colonel Merideth's qualifications as an officer of the Army of the Revolution.

The memorial was referred accordingly.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition of the late and present land officers at Dixon, Illinois, praying compensation for services in entries of land under military bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of Avery Downer, a surgeon's mate in the revolutionary Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Jos. Mitchell, praying to be allowed arrears of pay and bounty land for services as a soldier in the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GEYER presented the petition of the late and present land officers at Palmyra, Missouri, praying compensation for services in the entry of lands under bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, praying a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of their railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FISH presented a memorial of the assistant marshal of Sullivan county, New York, praying additional compensation for services in taking the Seventh Census; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted additional documents in relation to the claim of the heirs of Henry King, deceased; which, with their memorial on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, additional documents relating to the claim of John S. Devlin, administrator of Elijah J. Weed, deceased; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BERRIEN presented the memorial of Catharine B. Turner, widow and executrix of Daniel Turner, deceased, late a captain in the Navy, praying the reimbursement of expenses incurred by her husband in receiving and entertaining on board the vessel under his command certain public functionaries of the United States, in foreign countries, while on foreign stations, from 1841 to 1844; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PRATT presented the memorial of Lavinia Taylor, widow of a private in the Army of the United States, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, presented the petition of Anna De Neufville Evans, heir and legal representative of John De Neufville & Son, praying repayment of advances made by said De Neufville in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of the Board of Internal Improvement of the State of Florida, praying a grant of public lands to the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad Company, to aid in the construction of their railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. CHASE, it was Ordered, That the petition of J. Williamson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. NORRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of the widow of the late General John McNiel, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of the administrator of Gerard Wood, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, it was Ordered, That the memorial on the files of the Senate relating to the subject of amending patent laws, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. FISH, it was Ordered, That the petitions presented at the last session of Congress from assistant marshals, praying additional compensation for services in taking the seventh census, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. MASON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases.

Mr. DOWNS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Daly.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to revive a portion of an act for the relief of the widows of deceased soldiers.

Mr. HALE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill increasing the salary of the United States district judge of the district of New Hampshire.

Mr. MALLORY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Richardson and others.

Mr. WALKER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Wisconsin the Military Reservation at Fort Winnebago, in that State, to aid in improving the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Milwaukee to the Mississippi river.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill to relinquish to the State of Iowa the lands reserved for salt springs therein;

A bill to establish additional land offices in the State of Iowa; and

A bill to grant to the city of Burlington, in Iowa, the land heretofore reserved between that city and the Mississippi river.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of preemption claimants for the land upon which the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in Iowa, are situated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce the following bills:

A bill granting a pension to Sally T. Floyd, widow of Lieutenant George C. Floyd, late of the United States Army;

A bill for the relief of Theodore Offut; and

A bill to provide for the unpaid claims of the officers and soldiers in the Virginia State and Continental line of the Army of the Revolution.

Mr. PEARCE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill in addition to and amendatory of "An act to provide for the settlement of the accounts of public officers and others who may have received moneys arising from military contributions or otherwise in Mexico," approved 3d March, 1849.

Mr. BAIDGER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of M. K. Warrington.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the State of Alabama, in aid of the construction of the Mobile and Girard Railroad; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to authorize the State of Wisconsin to select the residue of the lands to which that State is entitled under the act of August 8, 1846, to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of employing one or more competent civil engineers to make the necessary explorations and surveys, and to ascertain the cost of supplying the Ohio river and its navigable tributaries with water, during periods of drought, from artificial reservoirs, according to the plan submitted to Congress by Charles Ellet, jr., civil engineer, so as to make the same permanently navigable for vessels and boats drawing four feet of water.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, on the 8th instant, was taken up for consideration and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to complete the sets of statutes of the United States in use in the Senate, its offices, and committee rooms, by adding thereto the ninth volume.

REPORT OF A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution explanatory of the act approved September 28th, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," reported back the same with an amendment; which was ordered to be printed.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

On the motion of Mr. SEWARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being his resolution of welcome to Kossuth.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, words are sometimes things; and I cannot disguise from myself that the resolution in honor of Louis Kossuth, now pending before the Senate, when finally passed, will be an act of no small significance in the history of our country. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] was right when he said that it was no unmeaning compliment. Beyond its immediate welcome to an illustrious stranger, it will help to combine and direct the sentiments of our own people everywhere; it will inspire all in other lands who are engaged in the contest for freedom; it will challenge the disturbed attention of despots; and it will become a precedent, whose importance will grow, in the thick-coming events of the future, with the growing might of the Republic. In this view, it becomes us to consider well what we do, and to understand the grounds of our conduct.

For myself, I am prepared to vote for it, without amendment or condition of any kind, and on reasons which seem to me at once obvious and conclusive. In assigning these, I shall be brief; and, let me say, that novice as I am in this Hall, and, indeed, in all legislative halls, nothing but my strong interest in the question, as now presented, and a hope to say something directly upon it, could prompt me thus early to mingle in these debates.

The case seems to require a statement, rather than an argument. As I understand, the last Congress requested the President to authorize the employment of one of our public vessels to receive and convey Louis Kossuth to the United States. This honorable service was performed, under the express direction of the President, and in pursuance of the vote of Congress, by one of the best-appointed ships of our Navy—the steam-frigate Mississippi. Far away from our country, in foreign waters, in the currents of the Bosphorus, the Hungarian chief, passing from his Turkish exile, first pressed the deck of this gallant vessel; first came under the protection of our national flag, and, for the first time in his life, rested beneath the ensign of an unquestioned Republic. From that moment he became our guest. The Republic, which thus far he had seen only in delighted dream or vision, was now his host. And though this relation was interrupted for a few weeks by his wise and brilliant visit to England, yet its duties and its pleasures, as I confidently submit, are not yet ended. The liberated exile is now at our gates. Sir, we cannot do things by halves; and the hospitality thus, under the auspices of Congress, begun, must, under the auspices of Congress, be continued. The hearts of the people are already open to receive him; Congress cannot turn its back upon him.

But I would join in this welcome, not merely because it is essential to complete and crown the work of the last Congress; but because our guest deserves it at our hands. The distinction is great, I know; but it is not so great as his deserts. He deserves it as the early, constant, and incorruptible champion of the Liberal Cause in Hungary—who, while yet young, with unconscious power girded himself for the contest—and by a series of masterly labors, with voice and pen, in parliamentary debates and in the discussions of the press, breathed into his country the breath of life. He deserves it, by the great principles of true democracy which he caused to be recognized—representation of the people without distinction of rank or birth, and equality before the law. He deserves it, by the trials he has undergone, in prison and in exile. He deserves it, by the precious truth, which he now so eloquently proclaims, of the Fraternity of Nations.

As I regard his course, I am filled with reverence and awe. I see in him, more than in any other living man, the power which may be exerted by a single, earnest, honest soul, in a noble cause. In himself he is more than a whole cabinet, more than a whole army. I watch him in Hungary, while, like Carnot in France, he "organizes victory;" I follow him in exile to distant Asiatic Turkey, and there find him, with only a scanty band of attendants, in weakness and confinement, still the dread of despots; I sympathize with him in his happy release; and now, as he comes more within the sphere of our immediate observation, amazement fills us all in the contemplation of his career, while he proceeds from land to land, from city to city, and with words of matchless eloquence, seems at times the fiery sword of freedom, and then the trumpet of resurrection to the nations—Tubam mærum spargens sonum.

I know not how others have been impressed, but I can call to mind no incident in history—no event of peace or war—certainly none of war—more strongly calculated—better adapted—to touch and exalt the imagination and the heart than his recent visit to England. He landed on the southern coast, not far from where William of Normandy, nearly eight centuries ago, had landed; not far from where, nineteen centuries ago, Julius Cæsar had landed also; but William, on the field of Hastings, and Cæsar, in his adventurous expedition, made no conquest comparable in grandeur to that achieved by the unarmed and unattended Hungarian. A multitudinous people, outnumbering far the armies of those earlier times, was subdued by his wisdom and eloquence; and this exile, proceeding from place to place, traversing the country, at last in the very heart of the kingdom, threw down the gauntlet of the Republic. Without equivocation, amidst the supporters of monarchy, in the shadow of a lofty throne, he proclaimed himself a republican, and proclaimed the republic as his cherished aspiration for Hungary. And yet, amidst the excitement of this unparalleled scene, with that discretion which I pray may ever attend him, as a good angel—the ancient poet aptly tells us that no Divinity is absent where Prudence is present—he forbore all suggestion of interference with the existing institutions of the country whose guest he was, recognizing that vital principle of self-government, by virtue of which every State chooses for itself the institutions and rulers which it prefers.

Such a character, thus grandly historic—a living Wallace—a living Tell—I had almost said a living Washington—deserves our homage; nor am I tempted to ask if there be any precedent for the resolution now under consideration. There is a time for all things; and the time has come for us to make a precedent in harmony with this unprecedented career. The occasion is fit; the hero is near; let us speak our welcome. It is true that, unlike Lafayette, he has never directly served our country; but I cannot admit that, on this account, he is less worthy. Like Lafayette, he periled life and all; like Lafayette, he has done penance in an Austrian dungeon; like Lafayette, he has served the cause of freedom; and whosoever serves this cause, whosoever he may be, in whatever land, is entitled, according to his works, to the gratitude of every true American bosom, of every true lover of mankind.

The resolution before us commends itself by its simplicity and completeness. In this respect, it seems to me preferable to that of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHELLEY;] nor is it obnoxious to objections urged against that of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] nor do I see that it can give any just umbrage, in our diplomatic relations, even to the sensitive representative of the house of Austria. Though we have the high authority of the President in his message for styling our guest "Governor"—a title which seems to imply the de facto independence of Hungary at the very time when our Government declined to acknowledge it—the resolution avoids this difficulty, and speaks of him without title of any kind—simply as a private citizen. As such, it offers him a welcome to the capital and to the country.

The comity of nations I respect. To the behests of the law of nations I profoundly bow. As in our domestic affairs, all acts are brought to the Constitution, as to a touchstone; so, in our foreign affairs, all acts are brought to the touchstone of the law of nations—that supreme law—the world's collected will—which overarches the grand Commonwealth of Christian States. What that forbids I forbear to do. But no text of this voluminous code, no commentary, no gloss, can be found which forbids us to welcome any exile of freedom.

Looking at this resolution in its various lights; as a carrying out of the act of the last Congress; as justly due to the exalted character of our guest; and as proper in form, and consistent with the law of nations, it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion in its favor. On its merits it would naturally be adopted. And here I might stop.

But an appeal has been made against the resolution on grounds which seem to me extraneous and irrelevant. It has been attempted to involve it with the critical question of intervention by our country in European affairs; and recent speeches in England and New York have been adduced to show that such intervention is sought by our guest. It is sufficient to say, in reply to this suggestion, introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] with a skill which all might envy—and also by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER]—that no such intervention is promised or implied by the resolution. It does not appear on the face of the resolution; it cannot, in any way, be inferred from the resolution. It can be found only in the imagination, in the anxieties, or in the fears of Senators. It is a mere ghost, and not a reality. As such we may dismiss it. But I feel strongly on this point, and desire to go further.

While thus warmly joining in this tribute, let me be understood as in no respect encouraging any idea of armed intervention in European affairs. Such a system would open phials of perplexities and ills, which I trust our country will never be called to affront. In the wisdom of Washington we may find perpetual counsel. Like Washington, in his eloquent words to the Minister of the French Directory, I would offer sympathy and God speed to all, in every land, who struggle for Human Rights; but, sternly as Washington, on another occasion, against every pressure, against all popular appeals, against all solicitations, against all blandishments, I would uphold with steady hand the peaceful neutrality of the country. Could I now approach our mighty guest, I would say to him with the respectful frankness of a friend: "Be content with the outgushing sympathy which you now so marvelously inspire everywhere throughout this wide-spread land, and may it strengthen your soul! Trust in God, in the inspiration of your cause, and in the Great Future, pregnant with freedom for all mankind. But respect our ideas, as we respect yours. Do not seek to reverse our traditional, established policy of Peace. Do not, under the too plausible sophism of upholding non-intervention, provoke American intervention on distant European soil. Leave us to tread where Washington points the way."

And yet with these convictions, Mr. President, which I now most sincerely express, I trust the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] will pardon me when I say that I cannot join in his proposed amendment; and for this specific reason. It attaches to an act of courtesy and welcome a condition, which, however just as an independent proposition, is most ungracious in such connection. It is out of place, and everything out of place is, to a certain extent, offensive. If adopted, it would impair, if not destroy, the value of our act. A generous hospitality will not make terms or conditions with a guest; and such hospitality, I trust, Congress will tender to Louis Kossuth.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, surrounded by Senators of so great ability—so experienced by many years in council—it is with profound deference to their superior wisdom, that I mingle my voice in this debate. I would much prefer being an auditor, but the extraordinary nature of the subject now under consideration, as well as of some of the doctrines insisted upon by those who oppose the resolution, compel me, however reluctant, to trespass for a few moments on your attention.

What is the subject of your deliberations? simply, whether or not you shall carry out the initiative hospitality of a preceding Congress. The adoption of the resolution "has this extent, no more." It is the natural sequel of the resolution of the last Congress, inviting the Hungarian exile to these shores. It contemplates nothing further. It involves no question of foreign policy—it looks neither to intervention nor to non-intervention.

Sir, I regard the honor of Congress more than I do Mr. Kossuth. The truth is, sir—and I might as well frankly avow it—some of the sentiments and opinions of this distinguished stranger and illustrious exile are not my sentiments or opinions in regard to the workings and the results of the British monarchy. But let that pass. I am glad that he has been received with so much cordiality by the people of New York, and that the Tammany Hall men and the Whigs have united to make his reception most honorable and gratifying to him. I commend this fact to the remembrance of the Senator from Kentucky, who, if he had known as much of the honor and virtue and patriotism of Old Tammany as he does of those old and time-honored principles of international law which would prevent an American citizen from expressing the honest feelings of a republican free-man without rebuke, he would have saved the fling he made at the old Democratic Wigwag in New York. But let that pass too. Sir, in view of the peaceful struggle now going on in the world between the friends of free government and despotism, it seems to me to be proper and right that his reception here should be hospitable and affectionate. Congress have made him the guest of the nation—as such the people in New York have received him. Europe will discern an emphatic moral in the event. The despots who drove him forth from his country, to seek an asylum here among the sons of liberty, will see from the greeting which we extend to him that the people of the United States fear them not; that on all suitable occasions we will speak out our abhorrence of their atrocious systems of government, and our sympathy with those gallant men, whether successful or unsuccessful, who strike a blow in defence of national independence and free government. By the course proposed, we shall testify our fidelity to the principles of our Revolution, and show that our Republic is steadfast in the faith of Washington and his compatriots. We will teach the world, that whatever of worth or wisdom, of exalted devotion to enlightened freedom, despotism in Europe may expel from her shores, will be appreciated here; that here our arms will be stretched forth and our doors open wide to welcome the exiled patriot; that in proportion to the ferocity of his persecution there, will be the cordiality of his reception here. But, sir, we are told that we will get entangled with other nations if we do this honor to Kossuth, and that blows will probably follow words. Well, sir, I am no prophet: I cannot tell what will happen. But suppose it should produce such a state of things, what then? Why, sir, we have got a Secretary of State who, with one oscillation of his great mind would blow all their fine-spun webs into thin air, and we have a gallant Navy who will teach them that blows will be given as well as received. Sir, I am not one of those who think that no change will ever be made in the principles of national policy which govern our foreign relations; on the contrary, I feel assured that the wonderful growth and development of the United States, far exceeding in amount and rapidity the most sanguine expectations of the founders of the Republic, will demand a modification of our national policy, in various respects different from that which prevailed in the infancy of the country. For the sake merely of illustrating this position, and in reference to what fell from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I will hazard the assertion, that the rigid neutrality of the Washington administration, wise and just as it then was, would not now (if a similar belligerent State of the world existed) be possible. Then our weakness admonished us not to risk the trial of our strength, or tempt the hazards of war. We wisely suffered much, submitted to many wrongs, and endured them as less evils than war with a powerful adversary. In truth, we consulted the dictates of a masterly prudence, in preference to indulging the martial spirit of our country. We chose to nurse the infant Hercules, until he should be able to encounter, upon more equal terms, the monsters he was destined to overthrow. I need not say how the proud spirit of America chafed, and fretted under the insults and aggressions of Great Britain and France. It is recorded in history that we submitted not without murmurs of dissatisfaction. But the injuries of the boy should not rankle in the memory of the wise man. I have adverted to them only to show the change which has taken place in these principles, which will no doubt hereafter govern our foreign relations. No American statesman can now contemplate any condition of the world, or any principle of public policy which would for a moment permit the United States to submit to any indignity from any power on earth. We acknowledge no superiors. Nay; all Christendom combined would not appal the stout heart of America. In a good cause, and with a united people, we know and feel that we are invincible.

Mr. President, it has become quite fashionable to approve and applaud constitutional monarchies; and the Government of Great Britain has been more than once referred to. Sir, I have not found, either in her traditions or her histories, one forward step in the cause of free government which she has taken except by compulsion. Look at her, and you will see a country whose government is monarchical and whose institutions are essentially aristocratical, the most prominent feature of which is the degradation of the masses. There, sir, the land, the operative capital, the law-making power, are in the hands of comparatively a few; while all the rest are reduced to a state of practical slavery of the worst kind—obliged to work for masters who are under no corresponding obligation to provide for their wants. Sir, this state of things in England is subversive of all the ends of just government. Their work-houses are crowded to overflowing; their home prisons and their convict receptacles abroad are peopled with the miserable results of their domestic serfdom. The end of all government should be the promotion of human happiness, the elevation of human nature; and a republican government is best calculated to realize these results. The issue in the coming struggle, disguise it as you may, is between kings and republicans; and, in my judgment, has commenced, in the amicable struggle now going on for British or American ascendancy on the ocean. The national sensibilities on both sides are keenly awakened and excited with reference to the contest. For my part, I desire the ascendancy of republican principles. All kings are alike to me. I desire the ascendancy of my country over all others—I desire, from my heart, success in this gigantic struggle for supremacy on the ocean. I desire to see the trident of the seas wrenched from the tenacious grasp of that haughty and kingly empire—not for the purpose of ambitious extension—not to tyrannize or dictate, in the spirit of an intermeddling propagandism; but to hasten the time when the sword shall no longer be the arbiter of national disputes. Peace is the true policy of this Republic. Peace is the animating genius of our institutions.

When the United States shall become the most powerful of all the nations of the globe, then I believe the time will have arrived when the principles of right reason, of humanity, and of Christianity, will exert their natural and superior power in making war no longer the last resort for the settlement of national quarrels. If we shall then presume to dictate, we will dictate Peace as the sovereign law of all nations, and War as the violation of that universal law. If ambition for the ascendancy of my country for such a purpose be censurable, I invoke the censure it merits; but before the world I declare this to be the spirit of my ambition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise for the purpose of saying to the Senator from New Jersey who has just taken his seat, that I should have asked the privilege of making an explanation during the progress of his remarks but for my reluctance to say anything while he was making the speech which he has so handsomely delivered. I hope he did not understand me when I spoke the other day as casting any reflection of an insulting character upon Tammany or the Tammany Society. If he did so understand me, he certainly misunderstood me, because I had no such intention. On the contrary, I spoke of the movement there as one indicating a disposition to change the long-settled policy of the country. I spoke of them as a body entitled to great influence, and possessing great influence, and I deprecated the movement on that account. I have risen merely for the purpose of putting myself right, I hope, in his estimation, and particularly in the estimation of the gentlemen who may compose that society, with which I acknowledge I have no great acquaintance, as the gentleman might have known from our relative positions on the continent. I have made this statement to show that I meant no indignity whatever to that Society, and I hope that I shall not be understood as having designed anything of the kind.

Mr. CLEMENS said: Mr. President, I regret very sincerely that this resolution was introduced. It is painful to do anything seemingly discourteous, and as I must oppose the adoption of this and all similar resolutions, I should greatly have preferred that the special champions of Louis Kossuth had been content to leave him in the hands of the people, without attempting to commit the Government to any of his schemes for revolutionizing Europe.

I have listened, Mr. President, with great attention to all that has been said in this debate, and if I have been convinced of nothing else, I am at least satisfied that the resolution on your table furnishes a most excellent subject for speech-making. It possesses the peculiar advantage, that the less we know about it, the better we can talk upon it. We may then give free reins to the imagination, and fancy can supply all that is needed to give beauty to a sentence or symmetry to the whole discourse. A great man bent, but not broken by misfortune; an exile pleading the cause of his bleeding country; a gallant people, struggling for freedom against overwhelming odds, overpowered, crushed for a time, but only waiting for a ray of hope, a word of sympathy, to rise again upon their oppressors; all these are themes upon which even a dull man might grow eloquent. The misfortune is, that so much of it is fancy; so little is fact. I understand the friends of Kossuth to base his claims to a public reception by Congress, partly upon the assumed fact that he is a republican in principle, and has been the great disseminator of republican sentiments throughout Europe; and I have heard, I must confess with some regret, that he was expected to liberalize still more the already liberal ideas prevailing upon this continent. In other words, that he is to give lessons to the descendants of the patriots of '76, and teach this benighted land the rudiments of civil liberty. Sir, I think it well enough to inquire, before we enter his school, when he became a republican? If I have read the history of that struggle aright, it was not until defeat and misfortune had overtaken him. In the zenith of his power—in the pride of his high place as Dictator of Hungary, he saw no beauty in universal equality, and knelt at no altar erected to Freedom. The contest in which he was engaged was not a contest between despotism and republicanism. It was a war of races. Kossuth and his associates were the oppressors, not the oppressed. So far from rebelling against the Emperor of Austria, they petitioned him, in the humblest terms, not for liberty, not for the security of their own rights, but for aid to enable them to keep another people in subjection. I have that petition before me. A short extract from it will enable the Senate to determine how far the Magyars at that day deserved the character of republicans:

From a Memorial presented to the Archduke by Kossuth and the Hungarian Ministry, July 4th, 1848.

"If his highness the Archduke John will bestow a careful attention upon all that we have just said, he cannot but be convinced of the true character of the rebellion of those States, which make great pretensions of fidelity to the sovereign, whilst violating the royal authority, he cannot but perceive that even their offer of joining Austria is merely a feigned pretext, in order to give at the crisis of the struggle such a superiority to the Slavish element in Austria that, after thus completely paralyzing the German element, and undermining the Austrian throne, the empire shall be split up into independent Slavish kingdoms, and the very existence of the Austrian Imperial House shall be thus buried.

"And yet loyalty and attachment to the King is so deeply rooted in the heart of the Hungarian nation, that the Illyrian rebels are well aware, that in openly exhibiting their intentions, they will not meet any sympathy. They have therefore come forward in the spirit of reaction, as the pseudo-heroes of the royal authority, and against the Hungarian nation, who have not attacked the royal power, for whom a legal independence and a constitutional administration is not a recent grant, but an ancient right, sanctioned by innumerable royal oaths—against the Hungarian nation, which at this present moment, when almost every throne in civilized Europe is tottering, remains not only the firmest, but the only firm prop of the Austrian throne. This feeling and this experience have led us to request the kind assistance of his Highness the Archduke John with respect to the Illyrian rebellion."

"The disloyal rebels actually boast of the support of the offended ruling House itself! And when we requested his Majesty, in order to enlighten the unhappy and deceived people, by his own handwriting, to let the people know that his Majesty disapproves of the rebellion, and is determined to maintain, in all their integrity, the solemnly affirmed inviolability of the Hungarian Crown and the authority of the laws, the leaders of the rebels deceived the people by declaring that this has not been done voluntarily on the part of his Majesty, but that it is merely an unwilling expression, extorted by the Hungarian Ministry, through means of compulsion."

The Illyrian rebels, against whom Kossuth so humbly petitioned the aid of the King, had demanded, and were struggling to obtain, some small portion of the natural rights of man, and the war which finally ended in the subjugation of Hungary was begun by the Magyars to keep the Slavonian race in subjection—a people every way their equals, and who, if we are to judge from the different character of the petitions presented by them, seem to me to have been far better entitled to the sympathies of a free people than Kossuth and his associates.

I have read the petition of the Magyars; let me now call the attention of the Senate to that of their antagonists:

"Emperor, if you reject our prayers, we shall know how to vindicate our liberty without you; and we prefer to die heroically, like a Slavonian people, rather than to bear any longer such a yoke as is imposed upon us by an Asiatic horde, from whom we have nothing good to receive or to learn. Emperor, know that we prefer, if we must choose between them, the knot of the Russians to the insolence of the Magyars. We will not, on any terms, belong to the Magyars. Remember, that if Croatia forms but a thirty-fifth part of your empire, the Croats constitute a third of your whole infantry."

Sir, the men who uttered such sentiments deserved to be free. They are words fit to be spoken by freemen, and I must be excused if I cannot feel any extraordinary enthusiasm in the cause of a man who sought to hold them in bondage. The question with me is, not whether he preaches freedom and equality now, when he is a wanderer and an exile, but rather, what was his practice when power was in his hands, and when to have surrendered that power would have been indeed amerit worthy of a world's admiration. The task of tracing the history of that period affords me no pleasure, but when I am called upon, as the representative of a sovereign State, to aid in conferring on any individual an extraordinary honor, it is my duty to ascertain how far that honor is deserved. What, then, was his course during the whole progress of the memorable struggle in which he was engaged? Did he ever at any time give utterance to a republican sentiment? On the contrary, was not his whole course that of a determined and haughty oppressor? When the demands of the Slavonians were rejected by the House of Austria, and they proposed to join their forces to his, upon the sole condition that he should guaranty them equal rights and equal privileges, his reply was as haughty and imperious as any ever uttered by the most absolute despot to the humblest slave:

"There are three principles which must prove as a basis to any conciliation, and in regard to which WE SHALL CONCEDE NOTHING, ON ANY CONDITION WHATSOEVER, for it would amount to committing suicide with our own hands:

"1st. The unity of the State.

"2d. The integrity of the territory of the State as it has existed for centuries.

"3d. THE SUPREMACY OF THE MAGYAR ELEMENT, acquired one thousand years ago by the armed hand, the foundation of our autonomy, and consecrated by the use of the Magyar as the diplomatic language."

This was on the 10th of June, 1849, only two months before the armies of Hungary were annihilated—Görgey a prisoner and Kossuth a fugitive in the dominions of the Turk. Even at that late moment the supremacy of the Magyar element was announced as an indispensable basis of any conciliation; and it thus becomes apparent that the right to enslave others rather than the right to be free themselves, constituted the main object of the war. The supremacy of the Magyar element was the leading idea, and much of the sympathy and enthusiasm which the advent of Kossuth has excited in this republican land might well have been reserved for worthier objects. I expect to be told, that whatever may have been his former sentiments he is now a republican in feeling and principle. Indeed the Senator from Massachusetts has already informed us that he has dared to utter such sentiments within the shadow of the throne of England. I have not so read his speeches. I have read a great deal in praise of the British constitution—nothing against the hereditary King and the hereditary nobility which disgrace it. British freedom is not freedom, as we understand it, and praises of the British constitution do not furnish the highest evidence of a clear conception of the principles of civil liberty. At all events, if we concede all that is claimed for him now, we must still bear in mind that he is only a recent convert. As long as there was a hope of his maintaining an iron rule over a people far more numerous than his own, republicanism never entered his thoughts. There is not a solitary paper emanating from him or his associates during the continuance of the war which does not establish clearly and conclusively that no one of them ever dreamed of the formation of a republic. The language of Count Pulszky is too explicit to leave a doubt upon this point:

"The most current misrepresentation of the Hungarians is, that they are Republicans, and that they have proclaimed the Republic in such of the Hungarian counties as are in their power, which now comprise almost all the Hungarian territory. This assertion is often unwarily repeated by friends of the Hungarians, who, considering that the Queen of England maintains amicable relations with the Republic of the United States, with the Republic of France, and the Republic of Switzerland, are not altogether horrified at the Republican appellation. But the real state of the matter is, that the Hungarians ARE NOT REPUBLICANS, and that the Republic has not been proclaimed anywhere in Hungary."

There is more, much more, to the same effect, but it is not needful for me to refer to it. As an individual, I am willing to concede to Kossuth whatever of merit he can justly claim; but I am not willing to say by my vote or otherwise, that I regard him as a purer patriot than Washington—a greater statesman than Jefferson, or a more skillful General than Jackson. There are living men now within the limits of this city whom I look upon as altogether his superiors. I am not one of those to whose vision it is said "distance lends enchantment." I respect rather that greatness which is near me—which I do not have to take upon the uncertain reports of others. If the nearness of the object should disclose infirmities—if dark spots or weak points should be revealed by it, I can still revere what is good and appreciate what is great, without looking for a perfection which is denied to man. I can kneel among the rank weeds at the base of a lofty mountain and worship the grandeur of the Almighty's work, without remembering the petty and the worthless things around me.

One of the most serious mistakes which has crept into this discussion, is the confident assumption that Kossuth is "the invited guest of the Nation." I deny it, broadly and explicitly. If he ever read the resolution under which he came he could not possibly have so understood it. That resolution was carefully and deliberately drawn by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] whose knowledge of language is familiar to us all, and who we all know is not addicted to the use of words the full import of which he does not understand. It is in these words:

A Resolution for the relief of Louis Kossuth and his Associates, exiles from Hungary.

Whereas the people of the United States sincerely sympathize with the Hungarian exiles, Kossuth and his associates, and fully appreciate the magnanimous conduct of the Turkish Government in receiving and treating these noble exiles with kindness and hospitality; and, if it be the wish of these exiles to emigrate to the United States, and the will of the Sultan to permit them to leave his dominions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is requested to authorize the employment of some one of the public vessels which may now be cruising in the Mediteranean to receive and convey to the United States the said Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity.

I need not say in this Senate, that it is impossible to construe the word "emigrate" into "guest." All that the resolution says, all that it meant to say, is, that if he and his associates chose to come here as settlers—if they chose to seek an asylum here, we would furnish them with the means of transportation. I am willing to admit further, that by the passage of that resolution we tacitly pledged ourselves to provide them homes when they did come; but certainly no ingenuity can give to it a broader construction than that. He was not invited as a guest. He was not invited at all; but simply informed that if he desired to come among us as an emigrant, the means of reaching our shores would be placed at his disposal.

Mr. FOOTE. Did the Senator read the whole resolution?

Mr. CLEMENS. The preamble is the important part, but the Senator can have both. [Mr. C. then read the resolution, as given above.]

It will be observed, that the resolution refers not to Kossuth alone, but "his associates" are connected with him throughout. If he is our guest, they are equally so, and entitled to an equally honorable reception. Further, the resolution does not authorize the President to send a national vessel specially for them, but simply to direct their reception on board of one that might be at the time cruising in the vicinity.

Mr. FOOTE. That is all we intended.

Mr. CLEMENS. Certainly. So I understood then, and understand now.

I do not know, Mr. President, that it is expected in any quarter to make political capital out of the movements which preceded and accompanied the landing of the Hungarian Governor, and certainly I attribute no such purpose to the Senator from Mississippi; but I have heard a great deal of that "swelling tide of public sympathy," which we are warned not to disregard. We have been told that the people have received Kossuth, and Congress dare not turn their backs upon him. I propose neither to turn my back nor my face upon him. I propose to leave him in the hands of the people. If they choose to get up pageants in his honor; if they choose to carry him in procession from city to city and village to village, it is no concern of mine, and I shall not interfere with so harmless an amusement. But it is a different matter when the Senate of the United States is asked to take part in it. I have been able to find nothing in the history of this man—nothing in his whole career which demands such an honor at our hands. If it is a mere political speculation, it is so much the more to be reprobated. We are not altogether without example in our own land, to which it may be instructive to refer. Not many years since there was a struggle for freedom on the southwestern border of the Republic—a struggle which finally brought an empire into the Union. When the successful hero of that revolution landed upon our shores, not as a fugitive, but crowned with the wreaths of victory, who ever dreamed of inviting him here to receive the homage of Congress? Sir, he was bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. He had shed his best blood, in his youth, in defence of our land. In ripper years, he had accomplished a successful revolution, redeemed a people from bondage, and brought an empire to lay at our feet; but for him there was no Congressional homage—no resolution of welcome. Sir, I am afraid that we are sometimes inclined to overlook the merits of our own kindred, and unduly exalt those who have less claim upon our sympathies. We can intercede with Turkey for the Hungarian—with France for the Arab—with England for the Irishman; but not a word is spoken here of the fifty sons of America who were murdered in Cuba. We hear nothing of national vessels sent to the coast of Africa to redeem from bondage our own citizens, banished to this inhospitable shore, for no sin but that of loving liberty well enough to fight for it in another land than our own.

Mr. President, I have yet another and a graver objection than any yet urged to the passage of this resolution. Since the landing of Kossuth in England, evidence has been piled upon evidence that he seeks this land for political purposes—that he comes not as an emigrant, but as an agitator. I know the Senator from Mississippi has denied that the speeches of Kossuth will bear this interpretation. That Senator surely could not have read those speeches with his usual care and attention. I read from Kossuth's London speech:

"When I declared, 'Let not remain barren your sympathy; help us to carry that noble cause to a happy issue; you have the power, so help,'—when I spoke that, I intended not to ask England to take up arms for the restoration of Hungary to independence and liberty. No, gentlemen, that is the affair of Hungary itself; we will provide for our own freedom. (Hear, hear.) All I wish is, that the public opinion of England may establish it to be a ruling principle of the politics of Europe to acknowledge the right of every nation to dispose of its own internal concerns, and not to give a charter to the Czar to dispose of the fate of nations—(cheers), and so not to allow the interference of Russia in the domestic concerns either of Hungary, or of whatever other nations on the continent—(hear, hear.) because the principles of freedom are in harmony, and I love—I am interested in—the freedom of all other countries as well as of my own. (Hear, hear.) My lord and gentlemen, these are the words which I again and again will repeat here in England, and there in the United States, from a most honored member of which I have had the honor to hear principles which quite once carried into effect, would and will give liberty to the world. I have heard it proclaimed from an honored citizen of the United States, the honored object of the sympathy and confidence of a great part of his countrymen, even a candidate to become the Chief Magistrate of the United States—I have heard, in answer to my appeal, declare that he believes the younger brother of the English race very heartily will give his hand to England to protect the oppressed nations not admitting interference with their domestic affairs."

Mr. FOOTE. I will ask from what paper the Senator is reading?

Mr. CLEMENS. The New York Courier and Enquirer. I shall read something stronger from other papers directly. Now, sir, it was not in London only, but everywhere in England, and since his arrival here, he has proclaimed himself a political missionary. His avowed object is to induce England and the United States to combine for the purpose of preventing Russian interference with the affairs of Europe. That is, we are to prevent Russia from interfering by interfering ourselves. We are to abandon the policy of Washington and his successors—forget all the lessons they have transmitted to us, and erect the United States into a kind of general guardian for the nations of Europe. I know he speaks of assuming a threatening attitude merely, and predicts that will be sufficient to overawe the Emperor of Russia. But suppose he should be mistaken in that prediction: we would then be fully committed to war. If he possesses one tithe of the foresight which has been ascribed to him, he must be aware that an interference begun by threats must be ended by cannon balls and bayonets. It is childish to talk of trammeling the action of Russia by threats uttered on this side of the Atlantic. She would laugh your threats to scorn. She would tell you that you have enough to do to manage your own concerns at home, without traveling beyond the Atlantic to interfere with the concerns of other nations. She would tell you to be careful that in traversing the world to give liberty to other nations, you did not lose your own. She would remind you that but recently a bitter sectional strife was raging in your midst, which threatened at one time to shatter your Confederacy into atoms—that the embers of that strife were still unquenched, and that it was the part of wisdom to secure internal peace before you engaged in external war; that when you had removed all the causes of bitterness at home—when you had fully cemented your own empire—it would then be time enough to say that the paw of the Russian bear should be planted on no soil without your consent. Such, sir, would be the answer of Russia, and such the answer we should deserve. To indulge in the use of threats towards Russia is either to cover ourselves with ridicule, or involve the country in war; and that, indeed, is the true purpose of Kossuth. Scarcely veiled in England, it has been almost openly proclaimed in America. Here is his New York speech:

"Then what is the motive of my being here at this very time? The motive, citizens, is that your generous act of my liberation has raised the conviction throughout the world that this generous act of yours is but the manifestation of your resolution to throw your weight into the balance where the fate of the European continent is to be weighed. You have raised the conviction throughout the world, that by my liberation you are willing to say, 'Ye oppressed nations of old Europe's continent, be of good cheer, the young giant of America stretches his powerful arm over the waves, ready to give a brother's hand to your future.' So is your act interpreted throughout the world."

What is the source of this apparition unparalleled in mankind's history? The source of it is, that your generous act of my liberation is taken by the world for the revelation of the fact that the United States are resolved not to allow the despots of the world to trample on oppressed humanity. It is hence that my liberation was cheered, from Sweden down to Portugal, as a ray of hope. It is hence that even these nations which most desire my presence in Europe now, have unanimously told me, 'Hasten on, hasten on to the great, free, rich, and powerful people of the United States, and bring over its brotherly aid to the cause of your country, so intimately connected with European liberty?' and here I stand to plead the cause of the solidarity of human rights before the great Republic of the United States.

"Having thus expounded my aim, I beg leave to state that I came not to your glorious shores to enjoy a happy rest—I came not with the intention to gather triumphs of personal distinction, but because an humble petitioner, in my country's name, as its freely chosen constitutional chief, humbly to entreat your generous aid; and then it is to this aim that I will devote every moment of my time with the more assiduity, the more restlessness, as every moment may bring a report of events which may call me to hasten to my place on the battle field, where the great, and I hope the last, battle will be fought between Liberty and Despotism,—a moment marked by the finger of God to be so near, that every hour of delay of your generous aid may prove fatally disastrous to oppressed humanity."

This language leaves no room for conjecture. His object is to secure the armed assistance of England and the United States. And now let us inquire for what purpose that assistance is sought? To establish liberty in Hungary? No; but the supremacy of the Magyar race. The exiles who have come among us have probably imbibed, and have certainly proclaimed, republican sentiments; but who believes that such sentiments have found a home in the bosom of the Hungarian people? It has been their boast for ages that they constituted the firmest prop of the Austrian throne. It is a well-known historical fact that they have clung to their institutions with a tenacity even beyond that with which the Mohammedan clings to the Koran. It is those who have remained at home, constituting the vast majority of the population, who must give character to the institutions a successful revolt may enable them to establish; and who doubts they will return to that constitution and form of government for which they have manifested so decided a preference? Our aid, then, if given at all, will not be given to a republic but to a monarchy.

The Senator from Mississippi tells us that we ought not to shrink with alarm at the idea of a controversy with Russia. I have seen no manifestation of any great apprehension on the part of any one here. But it by no means follows that, because we do not happen to feel any great alarm at the idea of a controversy with Russia, we should provoke that controversy. It by no means follows that because we are not afraid of Russia, we should go to war with Russia. She has a right to the same courtesy at our hands that other nations have. She has a right not to be insulted. If this resolution should be adopted, under all the attending circumstances, and the Emperor of Russia has the feelings of a man, he must believe—he will believe—that we have offered him an unnecessary and causeless insult. To demonstrations on the part of the people he has no right to object; but acting in our official capacity, we ought to be cautious how we do things calculated to disturb our friendly relations with foreign Powers; and, above all, we should refrain from giving our public approbation to an individual who has told us openly before landing on our shores—who tells us now—that his object is to agitate—to excite enmity against a nation with whom we are on terms of amity; who tells us, further, that his object will not be accomplished unless he can obtain from the Government of the United States a sanction and approval of his mission. When the news reached Gov. Kossuth that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi had been withdrawn, he saw proper to become highly offended, and assumed to deliver a lecture to a Philadelphia committee upon the conduct of Congress. Listen to his reply to that committee, and then judge how far we can now be justified in inviting him here:

"Kossuth said he was extremely rejoiced at this demonstration on the part of Philadelphia, and that he felt the highest gratification in being thus honored by the glorious corporation of that renowned city. Before he left Europe, one of the pleasures he had promised himself was to meet and mingle with the citizens of that great city where the Declaration of Independence had been proclaimed; and he felt now particularly anxious to visit the hallowed spot where that immortal charter had been adopted. But he went on to say, that at the present moment it was quite impossible for him to declare at what time he could go there, and that, indeed, it was not certain that he could go there at all. His object in visiting this country was not a personal one—he did not come to promote any selfish purpose, and he could not, therefore, do anything that was calculated merely to gratify himself. His object was to promote the great cause of liberty throughout the world, and especially in Hungary; and while he was sure the people of the United States sympathized in that object, he could not but say that he was deeply distressed at the action which had been taken by (one branch of) Congress. He had the highest respect and regard for Congress—he recognized it as the exponent of the national will, and in view of what it had done, his own movements were necessarily embarrassed. Whether he would be content to go beyond New York he could not now say; but he was free to declare that had the proceedings in Congress, to which he had adverted, reached him before he left Europe, he would have hesitated about coming to this country at all.

"The reason why I say this, is, that though I am fully aware of the circumstance that in the United States it is the public opinion of the people which decides in the last instance on public affairs, and though I must confess that I have received here in New York such a manifestation of the sympathy of the people as gives me hope and consolation, still I regard myself invited to this country by an act of Congress, initiated in the Senate. Now, had I known that in the same place where I was invited, the same body would now decline to bid me a welcome, I would have thought that I was not a welcome guest; so much the more as the President of the United States has formally invited the Congress in his message to consider what steps are to be taken to receive the man for whom he has sent a frigate to Asia, complying with the will of the same body in which now a resolution of no further political tendency—the simple resolution to bid me a welcome—was withdrawn on account of an unexpected opposition. Under such circumstances I would not have wished to intrude.

"And as it was, with the utmost gratitude to all who bestowed on him such marks of kindness as the city of Philadelphia had offered, and especially with sentiments of sincere regard for Philadelphia and its citizens, he must defer for a day or two any positive reply to the request which had been made to him."

Had the proceedings of Congress reached Kossuth before he left Europe he would have hesitated to come to this country. And why? Was there anything in those proceedings disrespectful to him? Was there a solitary remark made by any Senator on this floor which was not in the highest degree eulogistic of him and his character? Was there not everything in the proceedings of that day to gratify his personal vanity? Certainly; and there must have been some other cause why he would have failed to come to America if he had known what was to transpire. He would not have come here because those proceedings taught him that he could not succeed in engaging the Government of the United States in a war with any foreign Power, and as his mission here looked to that result, and that only. As he sought no personal sympathy, no personal protection, he would have directed his steps to some quarter where the prospect of obtaining armed aid for Hungary was more cheering. Sir, I protest against this intervention with the domestic concerns of other nations. I protest against this resolution, because it commits us in some degree to the wild schemes of an enthusiast; it sanctions the arrogance which rejects the home we offered, and demands as a right that we should offer in exchange the blood and the treasure of our people.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, having introduced a resolution upon this subject, I feel it my duty to say a few sober words. When I introduced the resolution, I was a little excited—perhaps a little more than I ought to have been. I shall endeavor to be brief, and perhaps what I say may furnish another illustration of the fact, that the less a man knows of this subject, the more eloquently he can speak upon it. I regret, and I wish that I could express my regret in such a manner as to convey it to others, that this resolution was ever introduced. I regret it exceedingly now. I feel that this movement, whether or not we shall be successful in it, is calculated, in some measure, to damage the great cause for which Kossuth has come to this country. I have watched his course very closely. I am somewhat acquainted with the history of Hungary, and I confess that I have been somewhat astonished at some of the illiberal remarks which have been made in relation to that man in this body. Honorable Senators, perhaps, in expressing themselves here, forget what I stated the other day, that every word spoken by an American Senator, in his place, in relation to this movement, must either aid the cause of liberty, or injure it, in Europe.

It has been stated here, by one of the most intelligent and experienced members of this body—by a gentleman for whose talents I esteem him as highly as any man in this body—the honorable and distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BENNETT:] that the constitution of Hungary was, in some measure, an unjust one toward the inferior races of Hungary. That is not the exact language of the gentleman, but I think it expresses his idea. Now, the constitution of Hungary was what all constitutions in Europe were during that period. All were unequal; all were unjust. Undoubtedly, the constitution of Hungary operated unjustly toward some portion of the great family over which it spread. So, also, has the English constitution; so, even, the republican constitutions of Europe. But honorable Senators forget one thing—and the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] forgot it—that the object of Kossuth and his associates was to render the constitution of Hungary equal toward all those inferior races. I do not care for some of those pretty histories which have been printed here, for most of them are libels. If there is a man living who has endeavored to give equal liberty, not only to the Magyar, but to the Croat, to the Slavonian, and to the Sloac, it is this distinguished man who is now in this country. Permit me here to say, in this Senate, that my reading of the history of their struggle is this: The associates of Kossuth, who surrounded him—who were the ruling and dominant men of the Magyars—did what is very seldom done in any country: they stripped themselves of their own power, they voluntarily cast off their privileges, and spontaneously elevated those inferior races. I think this is a remarkable example in the history of the world.

Take, now, the speech of the honorable Senator from Alabama to-day, in relation to this distinguished man, and I ask, in the sincerity of my heart, after a distinguished man has been invited to your shores, whether it is magnanimous, whether it is American, whether it is republican, to make any disparaging comparisons between him and others? One Senator runs a parallel between Kossuth and Lafayette. Another tells you that Kossuth is no republican, or that he has only become a republican since his exile; that he was not a republican in his prosperity. But, sir, I say here, that I have followed his course with deep and intense interest. I have followed the armies of Hungary and rejoiced in their victories; and I do not hesitate to say that there have been more unpleasant and hard things said of Kossuth in this Senate than have been said of him in all Europe, except by the bribed and hired prints of some of the despots of the Old World. I know that these harsh sayings have been unintentional. I know that there is the best feeling for Kossuth here. I want to express this, because I am afraid it will be misunderstood abroad. There is not a gentleman who opposes this resolution that does not at this moment delight at the idea of seeing Kossuth in this country, and who would not rejoice in the supremacy of the principles he now advocates. But it will not go abroad to the world in this way. When a Senator in his place, in the American Senate, rises up and states that Kossuth is no republican, that he was a leader of despots, what will be the effect abroad?

It would, Mr. President, be exceedingly unseemly in me to say anything looking toward the violation of that great principle of American policy—the principle of non-intervention in foreign affairs. It would be ungracious; it would be unbecoming. And here I would say, that I regret as much as any man living some of those theories which are brought to this country by very honest and well-meaning individuals, but which are not at all applicable to the condition of the people of the United States. I regret these things. Every American statesman—every man who thinks—ought to hesitate long before he would embark this great country in any of those dangerous convulsions of Europe. If this country had been forced into the convulsions of France in 1789, no one can tell the effect it would have had on the liberties of the country. So of the convulsion of 1848. Although that seemed to be a more general one, we see how it has terminated. Hence I do not wonder that experienced Senators should hesitate long before they would commit themselves to such a principle as intervention. But I do not understand this resolution to be any such commitment. Far from it. It does not matter what Kossuth himself may expect: it is only what this country may choose to perform. No doubt he would have been delighted to have this country unite with England to check Russia, and prevent Russia from crushing his country, in case another revolution should arise.

Mr. DAVIS. He expects that.

Mr. SHIELDS. My friend from Massachusetts says that he expects that. I believe he does. It cannot be denied that he comes to this country expecting that.

Mr. DAVIS. Suppose we do not grant it?

Mr. SHIELDS. If we do not grant it, we shall disappoint his expectations. But by receiving him in the manner which is now proposed, we make no pledge to grant his expectations. I beg Senators to reflect on this.

I may say that the character of Kossuth was formed in an Austrian dungeon. He is one of the most remarkable men of the present age. He has recently told more political truths in England than they have heard for half a century. This is the man that comes here. Gentlemen ask why he does not come as an emigrant? Why, sir, if you gave him the whole United States he could not stay amongst you with the feeling that now possesses his heart. He has but one feeling, and that is a high and noble one—the redemption of his own country. He comes to this country expecting that we might aid him in the accomplishment of that object. I did believe that this resolution could have done so, and I think so now. It could have helped his cause without any fear of intervention, if, without any debate, Kossuth could have been received here in this Hall and in the other branch of the National Legislature, quietly, silently, and with dignity. That of itself, in connection with what has taken place in England, would have prevented any intervention with Hungary in case of another revolution. That is my opinion. It was not necessary for this country to give any pledge—any promise which might deceive Louis Kossuth. No, it ought not to have done so. But had we received him quietly and unanimously, the effect of that, in connection with what is now taking place in Europe, would have accomplished his object; and he knew it. There would have been no necessity for armed intervention.

It is said that Kossuth has made some important remarks since he came to this country: and some of our statesmen are a little offended because he has spoken about the sovereignty of the people, and has distinguished, as it were, between the government and the people. Perhaps he has. One thing I know: he has been so followed by little petty slanders, that I am very unwilling to credit anything I hear, until I find it better substantiated than it is in any of those papers, and particularly the paper from which the Senator from Alabama read. So far as America is concerned, this commenced at Marseilles, and it has followed him ever since. I read these accounts with a great deal of allowance. I have read all his speeches in England, and read them with pleasure. There, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, in a monarchy, in the presence of royalty—you may say a monarchy that has acted very liberally towards him and his associates, and toward Hungary—and I wish they would act as liberally towards some other countries—he declared himself boldly and fearlessly to be a republican. This ought to bring him some respect in America, and in an American Senate.

For one, I confess that I am a little afraid that the republicanism of Europe will not be able to accomplish much. For, when a king has been unfortunate—when a crowned head, who has struggled in the cause of royalty, is unfortunate, all the kings and all the crowned heads of the world enter into competition to do him honor. He is sacred to them, because he has been unfortunate in their cause. When the last Stuart fled from his throne, the monarch of France received him in a manner in which he would not have received any other man on earth. Why? Because he had been unfortunate in the cause of monarchy. But when a poor republican becomes unfortunate—when a man who has struggled and tried to elevate his country, and his country has been crushed by a conspiracy of monarchs—when such a man is unfortunate, and comes to a Republic, the cry is, Oh, no! oh, no! Procul, O procul, este profani! We cannot sympathize with you without getting into trouble. It is intimated that we might, perhaps, insult Russia or Austria. And yet Russia and Austria do not hesitate much in putting down free countries, and insulting republicanism. I look upon this as a melancholy fact; and I look upon it not as a hopeful fact for republicanism or for liberty. France scarcely becomes a Republic when she sends an army to crush another little Republic for assuming the very same right which she assumed for herself. She would not allow the right which she took herself to the Italians. America has become a great and powerful Republic. America got some aid in the hour of her trial; and now that she is powerful and great, she says to others, You may fight out your own battles in your own way. We are safe, and we will continue so. This is going rather far; and there is one thing which, I think, has been carried too far: it is the ostentatious parade of this principle of non-intervention. We may act upon it; and it may be prudent to act upon it; but why parade it before the world? Why tell the despots of the world, that no matter what Republic they may crush, our hands are tied; that we stand, as it were, self-excommunicated from the rest of the world in that way. I think it may be very well to act upon that principle; and hitherto it has been well. It has, no doubt, made this country great. But I feel, at the same time, that it is not very prudent to parade it before the world, as the permanent, fixed, and unalterable policy of this country. I can imagine a state of things—and it was suggested by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STROCKRON]—wherein this principle could not be acted upon. If the present appearance of the world be taken as an indication of the future, God only knows how long we shall be permitted to act on this principle. Reaction is now triumphant all over Europe. When it becomes successful universally, who can tell how long we shall be permitted to remain here without some interference? Be that as it may, it is not the question.

I say again, that it does not matter now whether this resolution pass or not. The effect of it has been destroyed by this opposition. Kossuth, in coming to this country, must have either benefited or injured his cause. He came to this country to benefit his cause. He has said frequently that he wants us to unite with England, and form a kind of alliance, to prevent the intervention of other countries in the affairs of Hungary, and make other countries observe the principle of action which we have laid down for ourselves. We wish to make our principle universal. He says that it will not do for any country not to intervene; because that would require that country to be unfaithful in its duty to humanity. There is something in that view. He asks us to unite with other liberal countries, and prevent intervention. This country need not give him an assurance that it will act on that principle of his. But, by receiving him kindly, generously, hospitably, magnanimously, we would have made an efficient impression upon him, so that he could go back to Europe and accomplish, perhaps, his object, so far as his own country is concerned. But it matters not now what we do, because it seems that the cause of Kossuth has not been benefited by the proceedings which have taken place in this Senate.

I would beg honorable Senators to abstain from saying anything with regard to Kossuth which may injure his prospects. He will go back; and within two years from his going back to Europe, mark my word for it, there will be seen a revolution in Europe such as has never yet been witnessed there. Kossuth, in my opinion, is the man, framed by misfortune, formed by education, and, if I may be allowed the expression, raised by the hand of God, to prepare the materials for that great and, I hope, final and successful revolution in Europe. Senators may say that he is not a man to compare with Lafayette, or this man, or that man. This country owes to Lafayette an immense debt; but I say that this age has produced no man to compare with Louis Kossuth. He is, in my humble opinion, in politics and statesmanship what Napoleon was in war. He looks over the whole field of Europe. His country is his idol. No man could be what he is, if he had not that grand ideal before him, which he has. He has studied not only the politics of Hungary, but of Europe.

Sir, in England he seems to know her institutions, her weakness, and her strength, as well as Lord John Russell, the Premier. They are astonished, they are astounded at it. So with regard to France. So with regard to Italy. I consider him, therefore, if I may use the expression, as raised by the hand of destiny for this great mission. The time is arriving; the hour will soon come—here is the man!—here he is amongst us!

His speeches thrill all Europe. And the cause of Hungary is the cause of all Europe. Every man felt that when Hungary was fighting, she was not only fighting her own battles, she was fighting the battles of liberty; she was fighting the battles of nationality for the whole civilized world. Kossuth will go back to his own country, whether you receive him or not—whether you give or refuse this little compliment. He goes back to Europe. The first revolution that takes place there—and that may not be very far distant—my impression is, that Hungary will be erect and free again. Hungary cannot be kept down unless Europe is kept down. Europe must be trodden down first. The fate of Hungary is involved in the fate of Europe; and they will not keep Europe down—never! never!!

There is the most extraordinary phenomenon in Europe now that ever perhaps was witnessed before. There are more men in arms, from the Volga to the Rhine, than there were when the battle of Leipsic was fought, when Napoleon was at the head of his army—when he had aroused all Europe. There are more men in arms in Europe now than there were then. Napoleon is dead; he is not at the head of his army now; he is lying buried on the banks of the Seine, and yet Europe is now trembling under the tread of armies. Of what is Europe afraid? Where is the enemy? No one nation is now afraid of another. No, sir; but they have armed against such men as Kossuth; against the spirit he brings, and against the principles he enunciates to the world. They have armed against the spirit of democracy. I do not mean that in a little party sense. I mean it in a broad, national, mundane sense. I say now that there are no governments on God's earth possible but democracies and absolute governments. The old governments are giving way. Even England is effete. She will go, and she feels it; and her statesmen now are preparing to launch her on the tide of democracy. She cannot live longer unless it is done. She must go with the Absolutists or with the Democrats. Her statesmen see it. Why was Kossuth received so warmly there, not only by the people, but by the first men of the land? Why has Palmerston taken such pains to rescue him from the dungeons of Turkey? Why is he shown such friendship in England? Sir, it is because Kossuth is fighting the battle of liberty everywhere. All must become absolute governments or democracies. Absolutism seems to be in the ascendant. There seems to be but one mind from St. Petersburg to Lisbon. All the principalities of Europe in that neighborhood, political and religious, have become absolute; there all are absolutists now. England sees it. She sees that if the tide of absolutism prevails, she is excommunicated from the continent of Europe. She knows and she feels it. In my opinion it will not be long before England will be launched upon the tide of liberty; and that is why England courts this country at this time. She now turns her face to a nation which she rejected, and I may say despised, for a long time. Why does she do it? Because she wants this great, young, powerful, unconquered and unconquerable country to stand at her back in defence of these great principles.

I say, therefore, that Kossuth, in this respect, is an extraordinary man. His history is one of the most extraordinary that has ever yet been known in this world. Take him in his Austrian dungeon, where he disciplined his mind for the present trial. Take him at the head of the proudest and oldest aristocracy of Europe, the Dictator, as it is said, the organizer of the armies of Hungary. Take him as a prisoner in Turkey. It has often happened that men have been chased away by Christians, and have found refuge under the Crescent. Take, as an illustration, this man, who, as the representative of a country which defended Christianity—that carried the Cross triumphant—that man in his country is crushed by Christians and Christian nations, and he finds a refuge—where? Not on the continent of Europe, but under the Crescent of Mahomet. Then follow him: England and America unite in obtaining his release. He comes to England—this extraordinary man, whose career is more romantic than romance—comes there, and how is he received by Englishmen? I do not speak of mere English officials—I do not speak of men in high political stations—I speak of the strong, bold, manly heart of the Englishman, who has that inborn sense of pride and independence which scorns the idea that either Austria, Russia, or all Europe, would make him shrink from performing his duty towards a guest who comes to his country. I speak of that. I forgive England and Englishmen a few of the wrongs which they inflicted elsewhere, when they show the way in which they receive this man. There is something great in it. As for an Englishman, you could not get him to say that he is afraid of the Czar of Russia. You would never hear that from him. On the contrary, as was said by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STROCKRON,] if an Englishman is insulted in any part of the world, there is immediately an English fleet sent to repel that insult. I saw that myself very often.

From England he comes to this country. We propose here to give him a public reception and welcome. I before said that I regretted this discussion had commenced, but now that it has commenced, now that his name has been brought into it, I think it would be ungenerous, and almost wanting in magnanimity, to repulse him from us. In receiving Louis Kossuth you would do honor, not merely to him, but to a great principle. What is that principle? It is the very principle of our own political existence. Are you afraid to respect a man who is the incarnation of a great principle, when that principle itself is the very principle upon which our nation is founded? It seems to me that such should be the case. But this is said to be an empty honor. Very well; if it be an empty honor, why not give it to the Governor of Hungary, whom all acknowledge was once the Governor of Hungary? He was the governor of a great nation. Is not that sufficient to authorize his reception? I think so, and I believe that he will be Governor of Hungary again. I hope so; and I trust that this Republic will do everything a great nation can do to give him encouragement, and bid him God speed!

[Mr. FOOTE next obtained the floor, and made a few remarks relative to his connection with the subject under consideration. The report of them has been withheld for revision.]

Without finishing, he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 10, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER announced the following gentlemen to constitute on the part of the House, the members of the Joint Committee on Printing, viz: Mr. GORMAN, Mr. HAVEN, and Mr. STANTON of Kentucky.

Mr. COBB gave notice, under the rule, of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to enable the proper Department so to construe the act of June 28, 1850, granting bounty land to the officers, musicians, and soldiers of the American Army since the year 1790, as to embrace all persons who may have been mustered into, received pay from, and were mustered out of service by the General Government.

Mr. HALL, by unanimous consent of the House, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, "granting to the State of Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to St. Joseph, in that State."

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union.

Mr. H. said, if the House will indulge me in a solitary remark, I will state that my object in moving to go into Committee of the Whole is to take up the joint resolution making land warrants assignable.

The question was put and the motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.)

Mr. HARRIS. If it is in order, I will now move to take up joint resolution No. 1, explanatory of the act approved September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who were engaged in the military service of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is in order. The committee can determine what business it will first take up.

Mr. KING, of New York. Does not the rule require that we shall take up the business in the order in which it stands upon the Journal?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. KING. Then I desire to know what is the first business in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The President's message is the first business in order. The gentleman from Tennessee must move to pass that by, in order to take up the joint resolution to which he has referred.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

The motion to pass by the President's message was then agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS then moved to take up for consideration joint resolution No. 1, in relation to the assignability of bounty land warrants; which motion was agreed to.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HARRIS. With the indulgence of the committee, I propose to make a brief statement as to the objects to be effected by the passage of the series of resolutions which I had the honor to introduce.

The object of the first resolution is to make the bounty land warrants, the issuance of which was authorized by the act of 28th September, 1850, assignable.

Of the 2d, is to authorize the registers and receivers of the United States land offices, to charge and receive for the location of these warrants the same rate of compensation that they would be entitled to where the land was sold at public sale at $1 25 per acre, to be paid by the Government of the United States where the location is made for the soldier or his heirs, and in all other cases to be paid by the assignee or holder of the warrant.

Of the 3d, to provide for the same rate and character of compensation to registers and receivers for services already rendered in the location of this class of warrants.

Of the 4th, to extend the provisions of the act of 28th September, 1850, to all commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who have been mustered into the service of the United States to suppress or prevent Indian hostilities, and who have served a sufficient length of time to entitle them to bounty land under the provisions of that act.

Of the 5th, to extend the provisions of the act of 28th September, 1850, to the militia, volunteers, and State troops, who have been called out by the law or executive authority of any State, and whose services have been recognized and paid for by the Government of the United States.

The necessity of the passage of the resolutions under consideration addresses itself with so much force to the sound judgment and discretion of every gentleman upon this floor, that I should regard myself as trespassing unnecessarily upon the time and patience of the committee, to detain them with a word of comment upon it.

Mr. EVANS. I do not intend to offer any resistance to the passage of these resolutions. That these bounty land warrants should be made assignable, is very clear; whether they ought ever to have been granted, is another question. I can assure the gentleman who has introduced this measure that, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend to offer any opposition to it. Yet it must be apparent to every gentleman that we do not understand what it is. The resolutions are very long. I have heard them read twice, with great attention, and yet I am not able to comprehend them. There may be a great deal more in the resolutions than meets the eye. There may be a great deal more in them than strikes us at first hearing, and there ought therefore to be a copy of the resolutions upon the desk of every member here, in order that we may be able to suggest corrections and amendments if any shall be necessary. The resolutions can still be passed within a few days. They can be printed in a day or two, and we can then go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union again and pass them. They ought not to be passed with such precipitation. It is inconsistent with sound legislation to proceed with such unseemly haste. Neither is there any necessity for it. What we propose to effect to-day, can easily be effected before a single week shall have passed away. No delay will be caused by waiting until we can inform ourselves in regard to the contents of these resolutions. With respect to one of them, it seems to me—although I may have misapprehended it—that it directly throws upon the Treasury of the United States expenses which ought perhaps to be borne by the possessor of the land warrant himself. It provides that the owner of the land warrant, if it be assigned, shall be responsible for all the charges connected with it, but that if the land warrant is not assigned, and is in the possession of the original holder, then the Treasury of the United States shall pay all the charges of the register and receiver, who are engaged in locating and recording it. I do not know the precise amount of these charges. I do not know what they amount to upon a single warrant. But I do know that the Secretary of the Interior informs us in his late report, that the total number of these land warrants, issued under the act of the 28th of September, 1850, will be at least two hundred and fifty thousand. Now I am not prepared to say that it is not right and proper that the Government should pay these charges, but it is at any rate a fair matter for consideration. It is known to those gentlemen who were in the last Congress, that I offered strong opposition to certain features of the bounty land bill, but I do not intend to offer any opposition to these resolutions, or even to vote against them, as I understand that it is the general feeling of the House that they shall pass. I will, however, respectfully suggest to the mover of these resolutions, that he should allow the committee to rise, in order that the resolutions may be printed, with the understanding that as soon as they are printed, we shall again go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and pass them. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that they had had joint resolution No. 1 under consideration, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. EVANS moved that joint resolution No. 1 be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, presented an amendment, [a copy of which could not be procured,] which he intended to offer to the resolution at the proper time.

Mr. DUNHAM asked the unanimous consent of the House to lay upon the table and have printed an amendment to the resolution, which he intended to offer at the proper time.

Mr. CARTER objected. The committee was, he said, the proper place for amendments.

The question was then taken on the motion ordering the joint resolution and the amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, to be printed, and it was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. COBB. A few days ago I asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill of which previous notice had been given. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] objected to its introduction at that time, because he did not know the contents of it. He now understands it, and is in favor of its passage. Duty to my country and to the parties more particularly interested demand that I should press the bill upon all occasions, and I therefore again ask leave to introduce it. It is simply a bill to authorize the transfer of bounty land warrants issued under the act of the 28th September, 1850, granting bounty land to the officers and privates of the American Army since 1790.

There being no objection, the bill was introduced, and read a first and second time.

Mr. COBB. I now move to put the bill upon its passage, and call for the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would submit this question of order to the consideration of the Chair: When a bill is before us and there is a call for the previous question, is it in order, while the Chair is in the act of ascertaining whether the previous question will be sustained, for a member to make another motion? I submit that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is too late in making his motion. If the previous question is not sustained, then further motions will be in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] is correct. The motion to refer cannot be entertained pending the call for the previous question.

The question was then taken on sustaining the call for the previous question; and, on a count, there were—ayes 93, noes 31—no quorum voting.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. ROBINSON and COBB were appointed.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 24—still no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER stated, that if there was no objection the count would be taken over again.

There being no objection, the tellers resumed their places; and a new count having been had, there appeared—ayes 109, noes 25.

So the previous question was sustained.

The main question on the engrossment of the bill was then ordered; and the bill being engrossed was then read a third time.

The question now being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. COBB demanded the previous question; which was seconded, and under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FICKLIN. I ask leave to introduce a bill of which previous notice has been given.

NAVAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a privileged question. I have had the honor of being appointed a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I regret to say that I am under the necessity of asking the House to excuse me from serving on that committee. I make the request, not with any disrespect to the honorable chairman or any member of that committee, but for reasons which are entirely satisfactory to my own mind, and which leave me no other alternative. I hope the House will excuse me.

The question was then taken, and he was excused.

Mr. FICKLIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to protect actual settlers on the lands on the line of the Central Railroad and branches, by granting preemption rights thereon; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLARK asked leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Iowa for the purpose of aiding said State in the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to Keokuck.

Mr. CARTER objected, and inquired of the Chair what was the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER said, the regular order of business was to call the States for petitions.

Mr. CARTER asked if it would not be in order to take up the President's message and to refer it to appropriate committees?

The SPEAKER said that it would not be strictly in order.

On motion by Mr. JOHN W. HOWE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference to one of the executive departments, the petition and papers of John Morrison, asking for bounty lands under the law of 1850.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. CARTER. I now move that the House proceed to take up the President's message, and to refer it to the appropriate committees. My object in making that motion is to furnish the standing committees with their legitimate business, so that they may organize and go to work. I would inquire whether the message is now before the House, or whether it has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER said it had been so referred.

Mr. CARTER. Then I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the view of taking up the President's message, and distributing it between the several standing committees.

Mr. SMART objected, and called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER said that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] was a privileged motion. The regular order of business was to call the States for petitions; but the gentleman had the right, under the rule, to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken upon the motion to go into committee, and it was not agreed to.

SEATS FOR THE REPORTERS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, from the select committee appointed on Wednesday last to inquire into the practicability of procuring, within the bar of the House, suitable seats for the Reporters of the Congressional Globe, reported the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be and he is hereby authorized and directed to provide three chairs for the Reporters for the Congressional Globe, to be placed in front of the Clerk's desk, similar to the chairs occupied by the Reporters on the floor of the Senate.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. STEPHENS said: I will barely remark, that upon investigation we have found that three chairs may be placed directly in front of the Clerk's desk for the Reporters of the Globe without at all incommoding the House. If they should, they can be removed. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which question being put, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that the vote just taken be reconsidered, and that that motion be laid upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS.

The SPEAKER stated that the States would be called for petitions, commencing with the State of Maine.

On motion by Mr. LETCHER, by unanimous consent leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Richard Pool.

ADVANCES BY NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. PEASLEE, by unanimous consent of the House, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill authorizing the payment of interest to the state of New Hampshire for advances made for the use and benefit of the United States, in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream, in said State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TUCK. I believe there is a rule of this House which authorizes the presentation of petitions without detaining the House; and believing that we shall do nothing else that will be useful, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE presented the petition of Lemuel Hudson and Ephraim Sharp, which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES AT NEW YORK.

Mr. BRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to establish a Mint of the United States in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The House have already heard that petitions may be presented here under the rule of the House without wasting its time. It is important that the standing committees should have some basis upon which to commence their work; and preparatory to that, it is necessary to dispose of and refer the various subjects treated of in the President's annual message to the proper committees. That message has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, I think the proper course for us to pursue, is to go into committee, and refer it to the appropriate standing committees, and let those committees meet and report when they may think proper. It is right that they should have jurisdiction over the subjects to be referred to them, and authority to call upon the Departments for explanation and information. I therefore move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. The House is aware that the message has not yet been printed. I had intended myself to make a motion similar to that just made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] but until the message is printed, I can hardly see the utility of the motion. I think, therefore, the gentleman had better withdraw his motion for the present.

Mr. JONES. The message has been printed in the papers. It has not, to be sure, been printed by our public printer and laid upon our tables. When that will be done, the Lord only knows. [Laughter.] If we have to wait until we receive it from the public printer, with the documents which accompany it, we shall be obliged to wait for three months, at least.

Several MEMBERS. Five months.

Mr. JONES continued. My experience is, that it is not common to wait for these documents to be officially printed and laid upon our tables before referring it; but if it is the pleasure of the House to wait that time, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. JONES. No, sir, I do not. The House may vote it down if they wish.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will withdraw his motion. I doubt not, there are other gentlemen in the House in the same situation with myself, in relation to this matter. Papers have been referred to committees during the last Congress; they are now upon file in the Clerk's office, and cannot be withdrawn, except upon motion. But I hope the motion will be withdrawn for another reason. The rules of the House require that previous notice shall be given of intention to introduce a bill. Now, when the States are called for petitions, members are also allowed to give notice of their intention to introduce bills, as well as present petitions. I hope, therefore, it will be the pleasure of the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw, for the present, his motion to go into committee.

Mr. JONES then withdrew his motion.

Petitions were then called for from the State of New York; and Mr. JENKINS presented several.

On motion by Mr. HAVEN, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the petition of Silas Champion for a pension, and the accompanying papers, be withdrawn from the files, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

Mr. HAVEN gave notice that he would tomorrow, or on the earliest day practicable, ask leave to introduce a bill to reenact and continue in operation certain acts for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States.

On motion by Mr. SACKETT, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of Jacob Kerr and Adam Garlock, be taken from the files of the House, and that the former be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the latter to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. HART presented a petition from Samuel F. Butterworth; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. KING, of New York, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of Ira Baldwin and Daniel R. Granger, be taken from the files of the House, and that the former be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the latter to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PRICE presented the petition of Jesse D. Brown, for balance of claim; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROBBINS presented the resolution of the grand inquest for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, for the extension of the buildings occupied by the Philadelphia post-office; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution providing for per diem and mileage to John S. Littell, as contestant of the seat of John Robbins, jr., in the Thirty-first Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected; and the resolution was not received.

Mr. McNAIR presented a petition of sundry citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, relative to a modification of the bounty land act of 28th September, 1850; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. CHANDLER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files, for the purpose of reference to the War Department, the memorial and papers of Mary Ann Beecher.

On motion by Mr. CLINGMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Fielding G. Brown be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RIDDLE presented a petition from Delaware.

THE PRINTERS' MEMORIAL.

Mr. WALSH presented the memorial of the Congress of Printers upon the subject of the mode of giving out the Congress printing, and suggesting that a committee of three practical printers be authorized to act with a committee of Congress to fix the proper rates of compensation for the public printing, and praying a discrimination in favor of practical printers in awarding a contract for printing.

Mr. W. said that the respectable source from which it came commended it to the attention of the House.

The memorial having been read,

Mr. WALSH moved that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that it be referred to the Committee on Printing; which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WALSH, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Gallagher be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROWIE presented sundry petitions; which were appropriately referred.

On motion by Mr. FAULKNER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Jacob Thody be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. F. also presented several petitions.

Mr. McMULLIN presented a petition.

ORANGE AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

Mr. STROTHER. I desire to introduce a bill, under leave of the House, of which previous notice has already been given, for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

Mr. STROTHER. I presume the gentleman will not object when I tell him that I only desire to introduce the bill and have it referred to the appropriate committee. I ask that it be reported for information.

The bill was then read.

Mr. JONES. I would like very much to accommodate the gentleman, but I will say this to him, that if the State of Virginia will come here and ask this Government to pay the $120,000 which she says she has advanced to it, I will vote to pay it, but I am not going to vote money for the construction of railroads in that country.

Mr. STROTHER. I should be glad if the gentleman would postpone his objections to the bill until it comes regularly before the House upon the report of the committee, at which time I hope to be able to relieve his mind from the difficulties upon the subject. Of course I shall not go into a discussion of the question now. If the gentleman from Tennessee will not withdraw his objection, I will move that the rules be suspended, in order to afford me an opportunity to introduce the bill.

The SPEAKER said it was not in order to move a suspension of the rules for any such purpose except on Mondays.

On motion by Mr. McMULLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of George W. Hopkins, of Virginia, be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Daniel Steenrod be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. McMULLIN gave notice that at some future time he would ask leave to introduce a bill appropriating five hundred thousand acres of land to the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad.

Mr. JACKSON presented a memorial from

Thomas M. Newell, a captain in the Navy, asking for full pay during the period he was suspended from command; which, with the papers on the files of the House on the same subject, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COBB asked leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, for the relief of William J. Price.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I dislike very much to object to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb]; but if these things are allowed to go on in this way, we shall never reach the State of Illinois.

Mr. COBB then presented the petition of William J. Price; which, with the papers on the files of the House in support of the claim, were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SMITH. I have been appointed upon the Committee of Claims, and I desire respectfully to ask the House to excuse me from serving on that committee.

Mr. BOCOCK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SMITH. I hope the gentleman is not about to interpose any objection. I have reasons which, in my opinion, are ample. I do not ask it out of any disrespect to the source of appointment, nor from any disposition, on my part, to shrink from the labor it imposes; but, as I have remarked, I have ample reasons for the request, and I hope the House will grant it.

Mr. BOCOCK. I rise simply to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Ross] asked this morning to be discharged from service on one of the committees of the House. He gave no reason for the request, but merely stated that his reasons were such as were satisfactory to himself; and upon that statement he was excused. Another gentleman now, under similar circumstances, makes the same request, but gives no reasons upon which the House is to base its action. Now, I desire to propound this question to the House: If we go on to grant every request of this nature which is presented, without any reasons being given for granting such requests, what will become of the business of this House, or of the country? That is the suggestion I wish to make.

Mr. SMITH. I have no doubt the committees will remain full; there are a plenty of gentlemen who are willing to serve upon them. I trust, after one gentleman has this morning been excused, without giving his reasons, specially, the same courtesy will be extended to me.

The question was then taken, and Mr. SMITH was excused.

NOTICE TO LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. SMITH. I give notice that on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, I will ask leave to introduce a joint resolution requiring the Secretary of State to furnish Louis Kossuth with copies of the acts of Congress which define treason and misdemeanors against the United States. The resolution also further contemplates that if, after the reading of these laws, he should continue to make such speeches as he has made since his arrival in New York, inciting the young men of the country to take up arms against a nation with which the United States is at peace, it shall be the solemn duty of the President to have him arrested, (laughter,) and detained until satisfactory assurances be given that he will cease his efforts to enlist the coöperative aid and armed interference of the people of these States in favor of Hungary.

Mr. GIDDINGS objected.

THE RULE IN POINT.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to propound this question to the Chair. I wish to know whether any gentleman has not the right to give notice of his intention to introduce a bill? If I understand the rules correctly, when the question is presented by the introduction of a bill, if objection be made, the question arises, "Will the House receive it?" and upon that question there is something upon which they can act definitely. I only desire that we may understand these rules correctly, so that we may start right. My information is, that when the proper time arrives, any gentleman may give any notice he pleases, and no one has the right to object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Richardson] will, upon reflection, see he is in error. The practice of the House has been, that when a member asks the unanimous consent of the House to give notice of the introduction of a bill, if objection be made, he cannot give such notice. If it be on Monday he may move a suspension of the rules, and the difficulty may be avoided. But in order to afford every one an opportunity of giving notice preparatory to the introduction of a bill, a rule has been adopted providing that notice may be given by the filing of it with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any express rule with reference to giving notice of the introduction of bills, except that referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.] The Chair will remark, however, that it has been the usual practice of this body to give such notice by general consent.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to ask my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. Smith] whether it is his intention in offering this joint resolution to reenact the "Alien and Sedition" law?

Several MEMBERS. "Order! order!"

The SPEAKER. No discussion is in order.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SMITH. I will answer the interrogatory of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Stanton.] I do not desire to reenact the "Alien and Sedition" law, but we want no more "Pampero" expeditions. The object of this resolution is to warn Kossuth of the ground on which he stands, and to remind the public officers of their duty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SMITH. Well, but I do not understand the decision of the Chair as to whether I have the right to give this notice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman has the right, under the rule, to give the notice, by filing it with the Clerk at any time.

On motion by Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the petitions and papers of John H. Thompson be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, gave notice that he would, at the earliest day practicable, ask leave to introduce a bill, entitled "An act to make a grant of public lands to the State of Louisiana for the purpose of constructing railroads in said State."

Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, asked leave to introduce a bill further to extend the time of locating Virginia military land warrants, and for returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; which was read a first and second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GIDDINGS presented a petition.

Mr. BARRERE presented a memorial from Daniel Slack, of Batavia, in relation to the Mexican indemnity.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio, presented a petition.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, presented a petition from B. B. Bennett, of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NEWSPAPERS TO MEMBERS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read for information as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House furnish to each member such newspapers as he may desire, not exceeding in amount that allowed to members of the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. GIDDINGS inquired of the Chair whether the resolution was not in order under the rules as a part of the organization of the House?

The SPEAKER responded in the negative.

HOMESTEADS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to encourage agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and other branches of industry, by granting to any man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for a period therein specified; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise for the purpose of asking of the House to be discharged from service on the Committee on Public Expenditures. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Boccock] thinks it incumbent upon gentlemen to do so, I will assign the reasons why I wish to be discharged from serving on the committee, if the House will indulge me two or three minutes in explanation. In the first instance, I will state that I do not ask to be excused from serving on this committee out of any disrespect to the Speaker, as, I think, he will bear me witness. If there is honor or emolument flowing from serving as chairman of said committee, I desire no longer to enjoy such honor or emolument, having enjoyed them heretofore. I will assign another reason, and a very good one, it seems to me, and that is, when you come to examine the rules of the House, which define the jurisdiction of this committee, you will find that the Committee of Ways and Means, by the same language in which it is conferred upon the Committee on Public Expenditures, have charge of every subject that could possibly come within the range and jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Expenditures. In addition to this, there are six other committees that have jurisdiction of all that could reasonably come within the range of the duties of the Committee on Public Expenditures, producing such a conflict of jurisdiction that it makes the Committee on Public Expenditures a perfect nullity, and in fact does away with the necessity of the committee altogether.

I will say, in this connection, that, humble as I am, I have no desire to occupy a position as chairman of a committee which has no duties to perform. I will repeat, if there are emoluments or honor to be derived as chairman of this committee, I have enjoyed them as long as I desire. There is one other reason I would name: I am a member of one other committee, which, in all probability, will have much labor to perform. I hope, therefore, that the House will have no hesitancy in excusing me from service upon this committee.

The question was then taken, and Mr. JOHNSON was excused.

Mr. GORMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to supply the State of Indiana with the deficiency in former grants of lands for the use of the State University; which was read a first and second time by its title, and, with certain memorials upon the files of the House, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

KOSSUTH AGAIN.

Mr. ROBINSON asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution providing that the Congress of the United States, in the name and behalf of the people of the United States, give Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital of the country; and that a copy of the resolution be transmitted to him by the President of the United States.

Objection was made by several, and the resolution was not introduced.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE presented the memorial of the widow of G. H. McKee, which was referred to the Committee of Claims; the petition of E. H. Taylor, which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals; the petition of Thomas L. Judge, which was referred to the Committee of Claims; the petition and papers of Thomas P. Dudley, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions; and the petition and papers of Josiah P. Pilcher, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PICKLIN presented the petition of Rezin C. Martin and eighty-seven others, protesting against the employment of Chaplains by Congress at the expense of the Government, on constitutional grounds; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BISSELL presented the petition of Mary Prettyman for allowance of a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BISSELL. I also present the petition of Dr. W. T. G. Morton, for remuneration as discoverer of etherization. I wish to state to the House, that in this case the petitioner represents himself to have been the first person who demonstrated by actual experiment the fact, that the inhalation of sulphuric ether rendered the human body insensible to pain during surgical operations. I would state to the House that it is a matter of considerable importance; and I ask that a select committee of five be appointed to take it in charge.

The motion was agreed to, and the Chair was authorized to appoint the committee.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Nicholas Bohvin be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Illinois, and Mr. YATES of Illinois, presented petitions of certain registers and receivers, asking compensation for locating military land warrants; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. THOMPSON, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That the petition of Daniel Sampson, praying relief on account of blindness, brought on by exposure whilst in the service of the United States, as a caulker in the Navy, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALL and Mr. MILLER presented several memorials from the State of Missouri; which were appropriately referred.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, moved that the House adjourn; which motion was disagreed to.

On motion by Mr. CABLE, of Ohio, it was Ordered, That certain papers in relation to James McKall and Charles Foutman, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Moore and Hascall be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. STUART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public lands, for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary, in said State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PENNIMAN presented a memorial from certain registers and receivers, asking for compensation for services in locating bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the waters of the Pensacola Bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CESSION OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read for information, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the States in which they lie, alternate sections of the public lands along the line of all railroads, to construct which companies have been chartered by the Legislatures of such States, to aid in the construction of said railroads.

Mr. SWEETSER objected, and the resolution was not received.

On motion by Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the following petitions be taken from the files of the House, and referred as indicated below, viz: the petition of Harris and McCulloch to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; the petition of Maurice R. Simons to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; the petitions of Captains A. Buchel, John Huff, and G. W. Davis, to the Committee on Military Affairs; the petitions of William Alexander and Charles Pin to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK, by unanimous consent, introduced the following bills, of which previous notice had been given; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, viz:

A bill to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding said State in the construction of railroads from Dubuque to Keokuck, and from Davenport to the Missouri river; and

A bill for the relief of the preemption claimants of the land upon which the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in Iowa, are situated.

Mr. HENN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to provide for the correction of errors in the location of military bounty land warrants, and the entry of lands; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. HENN, the following joint resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Iowa, were ordered to be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the respective committees to which they were heretofore referred:

A joint resolution for an appropriation for the improvement of the Des Moines and Rock River Rapids, on the Mississippi river;

A joint resolution asking a donation of lands to actual settlers;

A joint resolution for establishing a land office at Fort Des Moines; and

A joint resolution respecting saline lands; and a preamble and resolutions on the subject of procuring from the United States a compensation for services and expenses, in defending a portion of the territory of the United States against the unlawful claim to the exercise of authority by the State of Missouri.

On motion by Mr. HENN, it was Ordered, That document No. 200, of the House of Representatives, (Treasury Department), of the first session 29th Congress, together with the accompanying papers, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENN asked leave to offer a resolution; which was read and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reoccupying Fort Kearny, near the mouth of Platte river; or of establishing a new military post at some point on the Missouri river, for the protection of the western frontier of the State of Iowa from Indian depredations.

Mr. HENN asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing a military post at the source of the Humboldt river.

Mr. SWEETSER objected, and the resolution was not received.

Petitions and memorials were then presented by Messrs. MARSHALL of California, and McCORKLE.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to create a board of commissioners for the examination and payment of claims against the United States arising out of the conquest of California; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. FAULKNER, it was Ordered, That sundry petitions of citizens of Virginia, asking that the military system now in force in the armories may be abolished, and that the said armories may be placed under civil superintendence, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VENABLE presented a petition from citizens of North Carolina against the employment of Chaplains; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE LAWS AND PUBLIC ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to regulate the publication of the laws of the United States, and of the public advertisements; which was read a first and second time by its title; when

Mr. S. moved that the bill be referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which motion was agreed to.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to prohibit the prosecution of claims against the United States by heads of Departments, Senators, and Representatives in Congress, during the term of their respective offices; which having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. S. asked that it might be put upon its passage.

Mr. CARTTER called for the reading of the bill; and it was read.

Mr. JONES. That is tolerably broad. We are all in the habit here, or at least I am, of attending to every claim which our constituents may send us against the Government in any of the Departments, or before Congress. I have never received, directly or indirectly, the first cent of compensation for such services. Now, this is a question which requires some investigation, perhaps legislation, and I will go as far as that gentleman or any other gentleman, to prescribe penalties of the severest character against members of Congress who may or shall prosecute claims against the Government for pay. But a bill should be so guarded as not to prevent others from attending to the legitimate demands of their constituents against the Government. I think that we cannot here, at this time, properly guard and frame a bill to effect these objects. I hope, therefore, that the matter will be referred to some appropriate committee—perhaps that of the Judiciary would be the most proper one.

Mr. SMART. I wish to say that there is a similar rule of this House in relation to one officer of the House at least, providing that he shall not prosecute any claim against the Government; and there is a penalty affixed to that rule. That officer, it is true, is a subordinate officer of the House; but for one, I have no idea of permitting men high in station to go unpunished, and visit penalties upon the acts of subordinate officers. I think the country calls for such a law as this. I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to refer, and I think he will concur with me in the opinion that such an act should be passed by Congress as this bill contemplates. Everybody knows the enormous amount of claims that have been presented of a certain description. Everybody knows the amount of contingent fees that gentlemen, Senators and Representatives, have obtained in prosecuting these claims. Senators and Representatives become interested in these claims to an extent almost equal to the original claims; and I think it is a matter that requires legislation. Why, you have upon your statute-book a prohibition that no member of Congress shall make a contract with this Government, and yet you see Senators and Representatives taking here $75,000 as contingent fees to obtain a claim against this Government. I have nothing more to say upon this subject now, and move the reference of the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] one question: Does he mean to say that any member of the last Congress has received a fee for prosecuting claims?

Mr. SMART. Not at all. I did not mean to apply my remarks to any member of this House, but rumor and the press of the country say that Senators have received the enormous amount of $75,000 for a single fee. I hope that the matter may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report a bill.

The bill was so referred.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. SMART. I ask the indulgence of the House to present a resolution for obtaining some information, and I would like to have the unanimous consent of the House upon its passage.

Mr. JONES. I would inquire if the call for petitions has been gone through with?

The SPEAKER. Not yet.

Mr. JONES. Then I object, and call for the regular business.

Mr. SMART. The information which I call for is very important, and needs to be before Congress at an early hour.

Several MEMBERS. Read it; read it.

The resolution was then read for the information of the House, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be communicated to this House, the whole amount expended by the General Government in each State and Territory since the year 1789, for forts, arsenals, armories, navy-yards, docks, light-houses, beacons, buoys, piers, and all public buildings, including cost of sites, and, as near as can be shown, the amount expended, including grants of land, in each State, for all works of internal improvement, and the probable amount that it will cost in each State and Territory to complete such forts, arsenals, armories, navy-yards, docks, light-houses, beacons, buoys, piers, public buildings and works of internal improvements as are authorized by law, and now remain unfinished. Also, the whole expenditures already incurred, or by law contemplated, for all public buildings and all local objects in the District of Columbia. Also, the whole amount expended by the Government, including the probable amount to be expended in virtue of existing laws for all the objects above named. Also, the amount expended in each State and Territory in the removal of the Indians, including the amount paid to said Indians for vacating lands in each State and Territory aforesaid; and the cost of each Indian war since 1793, designating the tribes or nations with which we have been at war, and the State or Territory to which said tribes or nations belonged while at war with the United States; and also, the whole expenditures of the General Government since the year 1789 among the Indians for all other purposes, designating the amount of expense in each State and Territory. Also, the amount of money furnished for sick and disabled seamen in each State since 1789, and the amount of pensions and land warrants granted to citizens of each State since the year 1789 aforesaid.

Mr. JONES. The departments, with the aid of fifty clerks, could not furnish that information by the end of this session. He therefore objected, and

The resolution was not received.

KOSSUTH AGAIN.

Mr. DOTY asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution, of which previous notice had been given, tendering a welcome to Louis Kossuth, and making an appropriation to defray the expenses, under the direction of the President of the United States.

Mr. ORR objected; and the resolution was not introduced.

Mr. DURKEE presented a petition; which was appropriately referred.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, entitled "A bill amendatory of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the holding of the courts of the United States in cases of sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts,' approved July 29, 1850," which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES. I insist upon the enforcement of the rule, and that is to call through the States for petitions. Gentlemen whose States have been passed, cannot go back and bring up their cases again.

The SPEAKER. The bill just read was received by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES. It was objected to over here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear any objections.

The bill was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SIRLEY asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information of a local character.

Objection was made, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion, in order that the message upon the Speaker's table may be taken up.

Mr. JONES. That would not be in order. The call of the States for resolutions would be the next business in order.

The question was taken, and the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. HENN: A bill to revive and continue in force the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting five years' half-pay to certain widows and orphans of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, both regulars and volunteers," approved February 22, 1849.

By Mr. BISSELL: A bill making a grant of land to the several States of the Union, for the benefit of the insane.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia."

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BRIGGS: The petition of Mathews, Wood & Hall, for compensation for losses incurred in building the custom-house at New York, owing to the failure of the Government to comply with their part of the contract, &c.

By Mr. AIKEN: A petition to change the name of the Swedish brig Ulrica to that of Etiwan, and for a register.

On motion of Mr. AIKEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Capt. John Baker Rogers be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of James B. Moore, Israel Lawrence, Henry D. Goodman of Ohio, and John H. Diehl of Pennsylvania, and their associates, asking the Government to enable them to establish a regular line of mail steamers from California, or Oregon, to China.

By Mr. TUCK: The petition of W. H. Y. Hacket, Robert Rice, and others, praying for the erection of beacons and buoys in the harbor of Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

By HENRY D. MOORE: The memorial of Horatio N. Crabb, praying for allowances withheld by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Also, the memorial of Bernard Henry, praying for the payment of a balance due him from the Government of the United States.

By Mr. BRAGG: The petition of Hugh W. Wormley, praying for a pension.

Also, the petition of Gilbert C. Russell, praying for the payment of damages for the breach of a contract by the Government, and seizure of property.

By Mr. RIDDLE: The memorial of sundry citizens of Delaware, praying for an appropriation to establish certain buoys in the Delaware Bay.

By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of Robert Milligan, of Washington county, Pennsylvania, a soldier of the war of 1812, for an increase of pension.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of Robert L. Ganis; also, the petition of James S. Mitchell, one of the volunteers, praying Congress to so change the late Bounty Land law, that a meritorious class of volunteers may be provided for.

Also, the petition of Hugh W. Wormley, praying for a pension; also, the petition of the heirs of Robert Henry Dyer, praying for a pension on account of his services during the war with Great Britain; also, the petition of John H. B. Rolls, praying compensation for a horse and saddle converted to the public service in the Florida war.

By Mr. SCHERMERHORN: The petition of Amos Knap, praying for a pension; also, the petition of George S. Clafin, praying for a pension; also, the petition of David Bell, praying for the payment of his share of the pension granted to the heirs of Jesse Bell, deceased.

By Mr. FLORENCE: The petition of William H. Topping, for services as Secretary to the Commission appointed to investigate the affairs of the New York Custom-House.

By Mr. MEACHAM: The petition of Henry McLaughlin; also, of Harry Halgate, of Milton, Vermont.

By Mr. WALSH: The memorial of Samuel Collins, of Baltimore, in relation to Mexican indemnity; also, the memorial of Dawson Phenix, a passed midshipman in the United States Navy, praying the reimbursement of certain traveling expenses incurred by him.

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of Abraham Pettin-gill for pension from September, 1834, to December, 1850.

Also, the petition of Eliza Merrill, widow of James Merrill, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. SCUDDER: The petition of Seth Crowell, and others, for a breakwater at Dennis, Massachusetts.

On motion by Mr. Briggs, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the establishment of a Mint in the city of New York be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BROOKS presented a memorial from the Industrial Congress of New York, remonstrating against proposed amendments to the bounty land bill, the reading of which was as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned respectfully represent: That they were appointed a committee of the Industrial Congress of New York, to memorialize your honorable bodies against any amendment of the most recent bounty land act, passed at the session of '49-'50, giving to the soldiers of the wars of our country certain quantities of land, upon conditions of a personal and bona fide entry of their claims, unless so to amend such act as to make more stringent its provisions and render absolute settlement and improvement of their grants a condition precedent to a title from Government; or, in the event such conditions might become onerous to some fairly entitled to the consideration of the people and the beneficence of Government, the substitution of a money bounty in lieu of land, would, in the estimation of your memorialists, meet both the approbation of the people and the merits of the case, and furnish no cause of censure except to that class of men that in every country speculate upon the necessities of the race, and deliberately forecast the increase of population and the demand for land likely to accrue from such increase within a given period, and then, as deliberately antedate its possession, with a view to enrich themselves at the expense of the people, while scattering them over tenfold the area of ground they can profitably improve, either for their individual benefit or the welfare of the community in which they may reside, or of the country at large; while they at the same time withhold from sale all choice locations, all mines, streams, the best land, the forests, coal-beds, and every spot likely to become the future sites of commercial marts, with a view still further to render tributary to them those whom necessity drives to the outskirts of civilization for bread and employment, or for the means to attain that independence of position which constitutes the aim and the worthiness of the Democratic citizen and the progress of the age.

Your memorialists conceive the rights of every citizen are infringed upon, where the lands of a country are im-providently sold to those who seek them not for personal use and occupation, and that the duty of all Governments to the people which they represent, is to prevent the accumulation of soil in the hands of a few, by any and all means in their power, and much more may they claim at the hands of their Government that wise and humane forethought-ness, that shall leave no excuse to the citizen for holding in contempt the laws and institutions he is presumed to understand, and to have himself created or consented to.

The parent or trustee of an estate that should so manage his trust as to give to, or permit a few of its heirs to monopolize its benefits, to the exclusion of the vastly larger body of those entitled to the inheritance, or that would blindly encumber such estate by anticipating its revenues to squander upon favorites, or in illusory speculations and expectations of the future, law, justice, and common sense would equally condemn and subject to punishment or public censure, and your memorialists conceiving the relation your honorable bodies bear to the people and to them, the same in essence as that which constitutes the parent and trustee, would claim at your hands, for the benefit of the race, and of the American people especially, such laws in relation to the future disposal of the public lands of our country as shall most tend to compact settlements of the people upon them and facilitate the establishment of common schools, canals, roads, and every other desirable improvement of the ages present and prospective—a result that cannot be reached and that seems not to be desired by those who would throw open to speculators lands ostensibly devoted to the payment of the soldier for services rendered to the country, while deeply infringing the rights of others and the public interest.

Your memorialists, in conclusion, would observe that the public mind is ripe for the occasion and opportunity to settle the unsold lands of the Union. That the spirit which animated our fathers of the Revolution has revived from the exhaustion of that and the later wars of the Republic, and under the better educational auspices of the times, is determined to conquer its liberties anew, and wrest from the grasp of monopoly and money, (which should at all times be the servant, not master of the people,) that which our fathers denied to the laws of primogeniture and entail. Nor would your memorialists omit to observe, that the conviction of the public mind is against the principle of granting bounty lands alone to the soldiers, not because they are not the soldier's due, but because he seldom reaps but a moiety of the benefit intended by such grants, and because the man of honest toil, upon whom the burdens and expenses of all wars mainly fall, is denied an equal claim to reward and the world's esteem, by the distinction raised in the preference given to the men bearing arms only. The public lands, acquired as they are by imposts upon, and by the toils of the people, should cease to be the sport of chance and the property of those who make the soldier's merits the pretence for their avarice and predetermined intention to hold in subjection to their aggrandizement the labors and increase of the population of the country; and the Government that tolerates and the people that submit to that invasion of their rights, and that neglect of duty which springs from a monopoly of land, however produced, can have neither a just claim to the title of democratic, nor be entitled to the applause of history or of mankind. Your memorialists, therefore, solicit that no change be made in our existing bounty land laws, tending to increase speculation in the public lands.

INDUSTRIAL CONGRESS, NEW YORK, Dec. 6, 1851.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1851.

Prayer by Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BRADBURY, of Maine, appeared in his seat.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted additional documents in relation to the petition of Hugh W. Dobbin; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the memorial of Richard M. Johnson, praying remuneration for losses sustained by him in consequence of his impressment into the service of the United States, as a pilot, in the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER presented the memorial of William A. Duer, administrator of William Duer, deceased, praying the payment of a balance due to the estate of the deceased, on a contract for supplying rations to the army under General St. Clair, in the year 1791; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of George Talcott, late of the Army of the United States, complaining that injustice has been done him in the sentence of a court-martial, by which he was dismissed the service, and praying that the Senate will investigate the proceedings of the court before acting on the nomination of the person appointed in his place.

Mr. F. said that he doubted whether the memorial should be presented in executive or open session, but on consultation with older Senators, he was advised that the latter was probably the best mode of presentation. He asked that it be laid on the table, without reference for the present; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of inhabitants of Fort Winnebago, Wisconsin, praying a grant to the State of Wisconsin of the military reservation at Fort Winnebago, to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of New Hampshire, praying the establishment of a mail route from Pittsfield to Farmington Dock, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication of Aaron H. Palmer, accompanied by a description of the colonial dependencies of Japan, with a plan for opening that empire to the commerce of the United States.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT. If a motion to print is made, it goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GWIN said it was a matter of considerable importance, and therefore he moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know what the wishes of the memorialist are; but it is evident, from the general tenor of the letter, that if the memorial ought to go to any committee, it should be to the Committee on Commerce. I move to refer it to that committee.

Mr. GWIN remarked that he had desired to refer it to the Committee on Commerce, but after having had a conference with its chairman, he thought it was not the proper reference. He withdrew the motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I had a conference with the honorable Senator from California, in relation to this matter. So far as I understand it, it is a question which properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and not to the Committee on Commerce. I understand the object of the communication to be to make certain suggestions as to the best method of opening relations with the Japanese Government, the ports of which are now closed against us. While the matter is one of a somewhat commercial character, yet in all the incipient and subsequent steps which may be taken, it is one eminently connected with the foreign relations. I therefore think the motion made by the Senator from California was the proper one.

Mr. DAVIS. I certainly have no disposition to give any particular direction to this paper. I hardly know what it contains. But, as far as I was able to understand from the reading of the letter, it seemed to me to treat entirely of the means of enlarging the commerce of the country. I take it that it belongs to commercial affairs. But if the gentleman himself, or any one else, desires it to go to a particular committee, I have no objection.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I suppose this is the document, or a part of the document, on which we had once "the battle of the books," between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Foote] and a Senator from Missouri, now no longer a member of this body, [Mr. Benton.] I supposed it was that; and I supposed that it would be a proper inquiry for the Committee on Printing to determine whether it should be printed or not. I am against the printing of these documents without the examination of a committee; I therefore moved its reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GWIN. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the question be divided.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I agree to it at once. I know what it is. Let it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the question of printing go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator from Iowa will withdraw the latter part of the motion, for this simple reason, if the communication goes to any standing committee, that committee will investigate the matter, and will be better able to judge of the propriety of printing it than the Committee on Printing. I apprehend it is not expected that the Committee on Printing should investigate the merits of every question presented. If obliged to do that, they certainly could discharge no other duty. I think, therefore, the simple question of reference should be made, and let the question of printing be determined subsequently.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I yield to the suggestion of the Senator.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of William A. Christian, a purser in the Navy, praying to be allowed, in the statement of his accounts, certain payments made to officers on board the United States steamer Princeton, holding acting appointments; which was referred, with the papers on file, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Daniel Anderson, son and heir of Thomas O. Anderson, deceased, late of the Navy, praying payment of the prize money due his father as one of the captors of the frigate Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of Thos. Pember, praying compensation for services rendered as a Purser in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Robert M. Hamilton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the petition of T. P. McBlair, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the widow of George R. C. Floyd have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Abraham L. Knickerbocker, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Thomson Hutchinson, and the petition of Barbara Kelly, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Daniel Winslow, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That the papers relative to the claim of Thomas M. Taylor, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the papers on file relating to the claim of Francis P. Stockton, a Purser in the Navy, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, it was Ordered, That the documents on file relating to the claim of F. P. Stockton, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PRATT submitted an additional document relating to the claim of Mary Williams; which, with her petition on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition of Richard Mackall, the petition of Bryan Callaghan, and the petition of the heirs of Robert Sewall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims; that the memorial of the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson and Ann E. Johnson, the petition of the legal representatives of John G. Muckall, the memorial of Benedict J. Heard, the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of William Somerville, and the memorial of Hodges & Landsdale, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Elizabeth Monroe, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. MILLER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill giving further remedies to patentees.

Mr. HUNTER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to establish a Board of Accounts.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act of 1831 in relation to cutting timber on the public lands.

Mr. BRIGHT gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution repealing a joint resolution approved March 3, 1845, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever any State shall or may be in default of the payment of interest or principal on investment in its stocks or bonds held by the United States in trust, to retain certain moneys to which said State is entitled, for the purposes there in named.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Milwaukee to the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BADGER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of M. K. Warrington and C. W. J. Shubb, executors of Capt. Lewis Warrington and others; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice by his colleague, [Mr. Mason,] asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FISH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish a Mint of the United States in the city of New York; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALKER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to grant to the State of Wisconsin the military reservation at Fort Winnebago, in that State, to aid in improving the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills; which were read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill for the relief of Richard Cheyney and others; and

A bill for the relief of Charles Melrose.

Mr. PEARCE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill in addition to and amendatory of an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the accounts of public officers, and others, who may have received moneys arising from military contributions or otherwise, in Mexico," approved March 3, 1849; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to procure a revision of the acts of Congress, and also of the statutory laws in force in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill granting a pension to Sally T. Floyd, widow of George C. Floyd, late lieutenant colonel in the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. U. also obtained leave to have the papers on file in relation to this case referred to the same committee.

Mr. BORLAND, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to revive a portion of the act for the relief of widows of deceased soldiers; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITCOMB, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of John Devlin; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MALLORY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Richardson and others; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Badger] is not in his seat, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 17.

Mr. BADGER. I hope it will be entered on the Journal by whom the motion was made. I should not like it to go out to the country that I made it and that it failed.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws in relation to alien and other passengers on board of vessels, so as to secure more effectually the penalties for the violation of such laws.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the survey, estimates, &c., of a route from St. Louis to the Big Bend of Red river, made under the direction of the Topographical Bureau by Captain Joshua Barney.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency, and probable cost, of straightening, grading, and paving Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth street west to Georgetown; the erection of a permanent bridge across Rock Creek, from the termination of Pennsylvania avenue, to intersect with Georgetown; the building of a sewer of suitable dimensions for draining Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth to Twentieth streets west; the extension of gas lights along the line of Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth street west to Georgetown; an increase of the Auxiliary Guard, under a new system of organization, sufficient to make them an efficient body; of supplying the city with pure water from the Great Falls of the Potomac; and the extension of a line of gas lights from the bridge above said to High street in Georgetown, and thence along said street to its western termination.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All these subjects were brought before the Senate by a variety of memorials which I presented during the last session of Congress. These memorials are on file, and I have been requested to bring the subject to the attention of the Senate again. I have thought best to do so by the resolution of inquiry. I hope the Senate will adopt it, and then I will move to take from the files the petitions on the various subjects embraced in it, that they may be referred to the same committee.

Mr. CASS. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time. I do not do so because of any objection to the resolution itself; but I have a resolution before the Senate, upon which I am anxious to have its action; and it will not come up at all during the session, if every other resolution is discussed, as it is presented, and adopted.

COLONEL TALCOTT.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the proceedings of the General Court-Martial held in the city of Washington in June and July last, upon the trial of George Talcott, Colonel of Ordnance and Brigadier General by brevet in the Army of the United States; and of the testimony taken before the said court; together with the finding and sentence of the court, and the approval thereof by the President.

Mr. HALL. I shall vote against that resolution, for this reason: Various attempts have been made in the Senate to obtain copies of the proceedings of court-martials upon private soldiers and sailors even when they have been put to death, and the Senate has refused to interfere. It refused to call for the proceedings of the trial of sailors who were put to death on board the Somers. And last session I made application to call for a copy of the proceedings of a court by which some private soldiers in a fort at Portsmouth were sentenced to wear iron collars with prongs around them, and balls attached to their feet, for twelve months. I could never get it. Private soldiers and sailors may be subjected to the most infernal and horrible torments which can be devised, and applications to the Senate to call for the proceedings in their cases are refused. If we do not interfere to protect the private, I am opposed to interfering for the officer. But as soon as an officer is tried we have orders for publications that would outnumber the pages of the Bible. For these reasons I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to the honorable Senator who introduced this resolution, that there is perhaps some unnecessary language in it. We have been in the habit of considering that a call for the proceedings of a court-martial was necessarily a call for the evidence and everything in those proceedings.

Several Senators. It does no harm.

Mr. BADGER. I admit that it does not.

Mr. GWIN. I think this case is one in which we ought to have the papers, because it will come up before the Senate in another form. A nomination has to be made to fill the vacancy occasioned by the removal of Colonel Talcott. If I understand the case properly, it is important that we should have the papers, and the sooner we get them the better.

Mr. SEWARD. I have a single question about this resolution which I will propose for the consideration of those who are wiser than I am: whether it ought not to be addressed to the President of the United States instead of to the Secretary of War? I suppose that the sending of such papers here is a question left to the discretion of the President. I would ask my colleague to consent to an amendment, substituting the President of the United States for the Secretary of War, and putting in the qualification, "if consistent with the public interest."

Mr. FISH. I have no objection to such an amendment, if it is necessary. I understand, however, that the resolution is now in the form usual for calls upon heads of Departments. I presume the Senate is perfectly competent to direct a Secretary to transmit such papers as it may deem necessary for its own enlightenment with regard to the business which is to come before it. The memorial which I presented this morning contemplates some further action by the Senate in the case of Colonel Talcott. For that action the proceedings of this court will become essentially necessary. They are voluminous, and it will take some time to prepare them. We know not when the Senate may be called upon in another capacity to act upon the case. I believe the resolution is in the form usual in such cases. If it be not, I will consent to the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I would say to my colleague that learned Senators around me are of the opinion that it will facilitate the passage of the resolution to substitute the President for the Secretary of War, and to insert "if consistent with the public interest."

Several Senators. Oh, no.

The resolution was adopted.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. BRIGHT, on the 6th instant, was called up for consideration:

Resolved, That the following shall be a standing rule of Senate, to wit:

The Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Doorkeeper, and Assistant Doorkeeper, shall be chosen on the 3d Monday of the present Congress, (first session of the 32d,) and on the second Monday of the first session of every succeeding Congress.

Mr. BRIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on the resolution; and they were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, if I recollect aright, that rule was, after consideration by the Senate, repealed, upon a view of the inconvenience which resulted from frequent removals of the ministerial officers of the Senate. I really would desire, before I can give my vote in favor of this resolution, to know upon what grounds this change is proposed. It seems to me to be inconsistent with the character of this body to elect its ministerial officers every two years. The result of the operation of that rule would be to deprive the Senate of the benefit which is received from the experience which the persons filling those offices have in relation to its proceedings. I believe that there is no Presiding Officer who does not frequently find a great benefit from referring to some of those officers with regard to senatorial proceedings. I hope that however much or however little we may regard precedents in other cases, we shall adhere to precedent in this case. I am unwilling, for myself, to encounter the risk, by a biennial election, of depriving the Chair and the Senate of the experience of officers who have served for a considerable time in their respective places. It is the less necessary to adopt this rule, because we have the power at any moment, by a resolution, to dismiss any one of these officers who may act improperly, and supply his place by the election of another. These are my views. If there be any good reason for the change, for the restoration of what was found inconvenient, I shall listen to it with pleasure. As at present advised, I am decidedly opposed to the resolution.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have offered this resolution without being at all influenced by the consideration who are now, or may hereafter be the officers of this body. The tenure by which these subordinate officers are now held establishes a principle anti-republican in its character, and calling for such change as harmonizes with the elective franchise generally. I do not wish to be understood as striking at the present incumbents, or as seeking to revive the old rule in order to displace any particular one of them. If I am so understood, I am misunderstood. It is the tenure by which they hold, it is the principle involved, that I am striking at.

A reference to the Journals of the Senate shows, that at the first session of the Twenty-first Congress (rule 49) was passed, which rule required that the officers of this body should be elected in the manner prescribed in the resolution under consideration. At the close of the Thirtieth Congress, an honorable Senator from Missouri, no longer a member of this body, (Colonel Benton,) moved a resolution, which was adopted, repealing the 49th rule, thus continuing the present incumbents without limitation. Had my attention been called to this subject then, I should have opposed the measure. Thus the matter has rested until this time, many of us admitting that it is a very anti-democratic feature in our organization, and one that ought to be corrected, but all agreeing the task of undertaking it would be a most thankless one, and in all probability result in the mover incurring the displeasure of those now in place. But be this as it may, and as much as I would regret to have the performance of that which I regarded as a public duty lead to such a result, I cannot be deterred by any such consideration from acting and speaking out.

Mr. President, I have never heard any satisfactory reason given for abrogating the 49th rule. It is said that Senators relieve themselves from the disagreeable necessity of saying yes or no to applicants who present their names for our consideration in connection with these offices; that it is a full and satisfactory answer to all our constituents who seek these lucrative offices, to say, Sir, we have disposed of them during the lifetime of the present incumbents, and therefore it is unnecessary for me to waste time discussing the merits of your claims, &c. Now permit me to say this is all wrong. These, like other places of public employment, should be left open for disposal at stated periods, thus enabling the incoming Senators at the opening of each Congress to aid in making a choice of the officers of the body in which they are to serve, and giving every good citizen an opportunity of sharing in whatever of honor or profit belongs to such stations. I do not mean by what I have said to be understood as advocating the principle of rotation in office. Where we obtain the services of gentlemen possessing peculiar qualification for the offices they are chosen to, and the public service would be promoted by their continuance, I would say, continue them; but continue them according to the forms and usages of a popular government, and not during good behavior, as it is called, which is nothing less than the grant of a life-estate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I regret that I shall be under the necessity of voting against any change in this rule. I regret to differ from my learned friend from Indiana; but I shall not vote for any change at this time. I do not want to see the Senate at this session, at all events, turned into a kind of electioneering hall. I think it is exceedingly imprudent, let me tell my honorable friend from Indiana, to introduce this subject at this session. After the general election, and after we have ascertained the result of that election, we may commence a general disturbing of officers everywhere. But I think this is a very bad time for the Democrats to commence to disturb the Senate. For one, I shall not do it just now. I am not prepared for it. It seems this aims at a general revolution. I perhaps might unite with the gentleman if he should introduce a resolution to remove a particular officer. Perhaps I might; but I do not know that I should. If that be the object, I should like to see it come in that way. I say again, I hope the gentleman will reflect that this is not a very auspicious time to commence a thing of this kind in the Senate.

Mr. BERRIEN. It was the concluding remark of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] which announced to me the principle which actuated him in bringing up this resolution. Up to that time I had not understood what that principle was. Now I submit to the honorable Senator, that there is no such principle involved in the present practice of the Senate. The principle to which he objects is, that any officer under our institutions should have his office as a life estate. There is no life estate in the ministerial offices of the Senate. You can, by a resolution, remove the incumbents at once. They hold their offices at the pleasure of the Senate. They are the occupants of their places at our will. Certainly, if there be any misconduct on the part of any officer, a resolution for his removal would induce an inquiry. He would be furnished with the means of answering any allegations made against him. But by this process, if it is intended to affect the actual incumbents, they are to be deprived of their offices and condemned unheard. They are to be removed, divested of their present tenure of office, and depend upon their capacities to obtain the votes of Senators to be restored. I take it for granted that though these officers hold their places at our will, yet the Senate is a body holding itself responsible to the country for acting upon principles of equity and justice, and no officer should be removed who faithfully discharges his duty. If there be a single individual now in the employ of the Senate who has failed in the discharge of his duty, I will cheerfully unite with any Senator in his removal upon proper evidence.

But I reiterate what has been affirmed by the Senator from Illinois, that it really does look like canvassing for the offices.

Mr. HALE. I have endeavored, in my humble sphere, to move consistently. I have usually looked out for the privates. I understand this resolution is aimed at the privates. If it is insisted upon I shall be compelled to move to insert the Presiding Officer of this body at the head of the list of those officers to be elected. I am not willing to begin at the bottom. I want to begin at the head of the chapter. I shall vote against the resolution; but if it is pressed I shall move my amendment. I need not say to you, Mr. President, nor to any member of this body, that I am influenced only by a desire to carry out a great principle. I think if that principle applies to one it should apply to all.

Mr. BRIGHT. The honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] and the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] reason upon this subject as though I were striking at particular officers of this body. I have announced that I did not seek or desire a change of the rule in order to reach any particular officer. If either of those Senators suppose that I am striking at a particular officer he is mistaken.

Mr. BERRIEN. Will the Senator allow me to explain? I have not made the slightest suggestion that he was acting through any such motive. I know he is not.

Mr. BRIGHT. I said, when first up, that my object was to reinstate a rule that had been over twenty years in operation, and one that is in union and harmony with the principles of the Government under which we legislate.

I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise at the opposition of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] I had every reason to suppose that the principle sought to be established by this resolution, would have found an advocate in him; but instead thereof, he seeks rather to weaken my proposition, by alleging that my motion is an imprudent one, and not altogether well-timed. I am at a loss how to interpret the language of the honorable Senator. Certainly there is nothing very imprudent in asking the Senate to declare that hereafter they will elect their officers every two years, thus abrogating the law of life estates in offices of this body. Certainly it is not ill-timed here or anywhere else, under a republican form of government, to advocate and declare in favor of so sound a political principle as the one sought to be established by this resolution. In view of the political changes in this Government, and the party proscription that has characterized the present Administration, I think there is something due our political friends wherever we have the power; and if the present incumbents are deserting the support of the party in the ascendant here, they have nothing to fear from the reinstatement of the old rule.

I have offered the resolution because I believe it right. I defend it because of my determination to permit no pressure from any quarter to influence my political action, and if voted down now shall renew it whenever parliamentary order permits.

A word in reply to the motion and speech of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] He moves to include the President "pro tempore" in the list of officers to be elected. I will venture to advise him to bring up that as an independent proposition. It is not germane to the question before the Senate. That officer is chosen under a constitutional enactment, and the tenure of his office dependent on something higher than a mere rule of the Senate. I hope he will not persist in his motion to amend, but allow us to vote on the resolution as it is.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] seems disposed to get back to former usages again; to stand super antiquas vias of the Senate. So do I; and I suppose that the rule of the Senate, as it now exists, is that very same rule under which the Senate was originally organized. I agree with the honorable Senator, that it is perfectly proper that every legislative body, at its organization, should choose its own officers. But will he tell me when the Senate has ever been organized since the first Senate met? When has there ceased to be a Senate? At what period did a new Senate commence? At what moment in the past history of this body was it without an organization? Sir, under the Constitution, no such a thing takes place in this body as a new organization. When the Senate commenced its proceedings, it appointed its officers according to the nature of its own constitution, and not according to the constitution of the other House of Congress, and so it proceeded for many years.

But I do not wish to pursue inquiries of that kind, but would suggest to the Senate this consideration: The rule which it is now sought to reinstate, had existed for a number of years. During the last Congress a Senator from Missouri, not now a member of this body, [Mr. BENTON,] offered a resolution to rescind the rule, and return to what had been the practice of this body from the beginning. We all recollect when that resolution was introduced, that it was adopted by the unanimous consent of this body. Not one word was said against it. What is the inference? We must suppose, as no one objected, that all were in favor of it. If everybody was in favor of it then, permit me to inquire why it is that any should have changed their opinions since? If it was proper to restore the practice of the Senate, when Mr. Benton was a member of this body, what has happened since, what facts have been developed, what discoveries made, what secrets transpired, which should lead us now to wish to undo what was then done by the unanimous consent of the body? It seems to me that we shall occupy a very unenviable position before the country, if we adopt this resolution. When Mr. Benton proposed the restoration of the old practice, no man opened his mouth against it, and yet now we are told that a high principle requires the adoption of this resolution. It must be inferred, then, that what was done commanded unanimous consent, because at that time either all of us were so ignorant that we could not discover the great principle involved, or all so timid that none of us objected to his proposition. I hope the resolution will not be adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator from Indiana. I believe the principle involved is a sound one, and that the practice to which it tends is equally sound. I regard the present rule as substantially establishing the principle of life offices. I shall vote for the resolution without any reference to who are to fill the offices, or whether there shall be any change in them or not. That will be a question to be determined afterwards. But I do believe that the true principle is to have a fixed time at which the office is to expire and an election to be gone into; and in order to establish that, I shall vote for the resolution.

With regard to the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, I could not see that there was much force in it. I presume that the reason why there was no opposition made to the motion of the Senator from Missouri alluded to, was that it came up in the morning business, when it was not known what was the pending question. If I had known of it, I should not have voted for it; and the same I believe to be true with regard to the Senator from Indiana also. But whether that be so or not, is a matter of no consequence. The question is, What is the true practice of the Senate as regards this question? Believing that the sound practice is to have a fixed term of office, at the expiration of which a new election is to take place, I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I will add one word to what has been said by my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] I regard these officers as holding their places by a tenure at our pleasure, and also as holding them during good behavior. I say that the subordinate officers of this Senate should not be removed so long as they discharge their duties properly. That is my opinion. I differ from my friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] entirely, in saying that offices of this kind should be made the subject of contention and strife. An officer, like our Secretary and those who are associated with him, should be almost as stationary as the records. I like to have them associated together. I shall therefore vote against the resolution.

The yeas and nays being taken on the proposition, resulted—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Sumner, Walker, and Whitcomb—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Geyer, Hale, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Rhetts, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Upham, and Wade—24.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. ATCHISON. I now move to reconsider the vote on the resolution; and I move that that motion lie on the table. I am not altogether satisfied with the vote which I gave. I wish further time for consideration. Therefore I move to reconsider the vote, and ask that that motion lie on the table. If it is laid on the table, I presume it can be taken up at any time a majority of the Senate think proper.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I understand the matter, the effect of laying on the table of the motion to reconsider will be to clinch the matter against the power of reconsideration. The universal practice in the House of Representatives is, that after a measure is passed, a motion is made by some of its friends to reconsider it, and to lay that motion on the table, which, if agreed to, prevents the body touching the question again.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not consider that to be the effect of the adoption of the motion.

Mr. HALE. The practice referred to by the Senator from Illinois, is because in the other House it requires a two thirds vote to take any subject from the table. Here it only requires a majority.

Mr. DAWSO. If I understand the rule, notwithstanding you may lay this motion on the table, any Senator may, to-morrow, move to change the rules of this body to-morrow. We cannot be precluded by any motion of this kind from any exercise of any power belonging to the body.

Mr. BRIGHT. The object of the honorable Senator from Missouri is, I suppose, to reach the subject at a subsequent period of the session. If the process of repentance has already commenced in his mind, I hope it may continue until it shall reach that point that a sense of justice will permit him to support the proposition. I hope that a reconsideration will take place at some future day, and that the rule will be reinstated. I shall vote with the honorable Senator under that impression.

The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was agreed to.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

On the motion of Mr. HALE, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain.

The PRESIDENT announced that forty-five ballots had been cast, of which number twenty-three was necessary to a choice; of which—

Rev. C. M. Butler received.....	25
Rev. Mr. Gallagher.....	12
Rev. Dr. Junkin.....	4
Rev. R. R. Gurley.....	3
Rev. C. W. Rodier.....	1
	45.

The Rev. C. M. BUTLER was declared to be duly elected Chaplain of the Senate for the present session.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolution submitted by Mr. SEWARD, in these words:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States, in the name and in behalf of the people of the United States, give to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and to the country; and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to him by the President of the United States.

When the resolution was under consideration yesterday,

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, said: I regret exceedingly to feel constrained to say something more in defence of myself and in explanation of the attitude which I occupy in connection with this truly delicate and painful affair. But several remarks have fallen this morning from the lips of the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] which compel me to throw myself again upon the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes, whilst I endeavor to shield myself against that reprehension to which it is most apparent I must stand exposed should I remain silent under the strictures to which I have been so unexpectedly, and I will add so undeservedly, subjected. Sir, it is most true that I am the author of the resolution which has been read in our hearing this morning by the honorable Senator from Alabama, under the authority of which the illustrious champion of Hungarian freedom and independence was invited to our hospitable shores, and made for a season the guest of the nation. It is equally true that at the time of the adoption of this resolution this renowned personage was a prisoner in charge of the Turkish Government, and that the main object which I had in view in urging the adoption of the resolution was to procure the liberation of Kossuth and his companions in captivity, and to secure to them a permanent asylum in this country, where the liberty of which they had been cruelly despoiled in their native hemisphere might be restored to them once more. It is also true, sir, that this resolution did not at all contemplate the least indelicate or intrusive intermeddling on the part of the Government of the United States with the affairs of continental Europe. It never entered into my head for a moment that this movement could in the least degree embarrass or compromise our international relations, or commit this Republic to the multiplied hazards of a bloody and exhausting war with the despotic powers of the Old World. I expected Governor Kossuth and his associates in imprisonment to be brought in one of our national vessels across the Atlantic, and to be allowed to become participants with ourselves in the multiplied blessings which a bounteous Providence has vouchsafed to the happy millions who inhabit this fair land. Our resolution did express sympathy for those in behalf of whom it was drawn up and presented for the consideration of the two Houses of Congress; but it did not express more sympathy, I am sure, than was felt by the whole body of our citizens, and was but faintly typical of that extraordinary outburst of affectionate regard and admiration with which this remarkable man is destined to be received in every part of our wide-spread Republic that may hereafter be honored with his presence. I have already stated once or twice, and I will again state, that I did not originate the resolution introduced by me in the beginning of our present session, and afterwards withdrawn because of the vehement opposition which I saw it was to encounter here, for the sake of gaining a little additional notoriety, or even because I had myself come to the conclusion that any particular form of reception by Congress was indispensably necessary. Indeed, I should never have connected myself with the affair at all, but for the fact that the gentleman who discharges with such marked ability the duties of Secretary of State at the present time did me the honor of calling my attention to the subject a day or two before the commencement of our session, and urged upon me the propriety of bringing forward a joint resolution providing for the reception of Governor Kossuth by the two Houses of Congress. Sir, it is not as a political ally that I refer to Mr. Webster at present, and surely not in the spirit of mere partisan opposition. The occasion is one, in my judgment, far above all mere party or personal considerations. But censured and carped as I am in consequence of the part which I have thought proper to act, under monitions from so high a quarter, I will say, that no one who knows the Secretary of State, and is familiar with the attributes which adorn his character as a public man, can suppose it possible that he could have counselled a movement calculated in the least degree to compromise our international relations. When I first proposed to the Senate the resolution offered by me, I distinctly stated the fact, that I acted under the advice of the Secretary of State, and that his name was mentioned in connection with this movement with the knowledge and consent of that gentleman himself. Now, sir, this is no fitting time or place for the delivery of a personal eulogy upon the accomplished statesman, jurist, and orator, to whose special promptings I have thought it not improper for me to yield, touching a transaction, all the bearings of which, whether domestic or foreign, I could not doubt his capacity fairly to appreciate; especially did I deem it discreet to conform my action to his counsels upon this very delicate subject, in consideration of the fact that he was discharging the functions of a high office under the Government, the incumbency of which necessarily enabled him to take a more extended view than any other man of all our international relations, and qualified him, above all men living, to determine as to the precise mode in which the various Departments of the Government should receive the distinguished guest of the nation at the nation's capital. Sir, I have said that I should deliver no eulogy on Mr. Webster. He needs none at my hands. His fame fills the civilized world, and his name has become a terror to tyrants throughout Christendom. Indeed, I could not, perhaps, declare all the admiration which I feel for this gentleman's high powers and gracious qualities, without giving rise perchance to some suspicion that I was about to become the special supporter and advocate of his claims to higher official honors than he has yet enjoyed. Not being willing to incur the risk of an imputation which might embarrass my existing relations with the members of that great political party with which I have long had the honor of holding a firm and affectionate alliance, (relations, too, which no man could value more highly than I do;) and not feeling authorized, as a member of the Union party of my own beloved State, at present absolutely to commit myself in regard to the complex question of who shall be elected President in 1852—I shall, without saying more in praise of New England's gifted son myself, bring forward a witness in his behalf whose eloquent voice has been often heard in this grand Hall of national consultation, and whose manly advocacy of the Constitution and laws of the Union during that fearful struggle which, I hope, is now drawing to a close, will command for his winged words of fervent energy a more than patient hearing from those whom I behold before me and around me upon this grave occasion. Mr. Choate, the other day, in Faneuil Hall, spoke thus of Mr. Webster, in connection with the uncertain and tumultuous condition of the general affairs of the world at the present moment:

"How unsettled is that world, what clouds and darkness rests on its future of the next four years, you all appreciate. It seems as if the prerogatives of thrones, and the rights of man, and the hoarded up revenges and griefs of centuries, were unheating for a conflict, in which, as in the apocalyptic vision, blood shall flow to the brides of the horses; in which the clock of time shall be found to have struck another hour; in which one age of the race shall pass away forever; in which society itself is to be tried by fire and steel, whether it be of nature and of God, or no."

"In such a conflict have we nothing to fear? Has not the whole expanse of the Atlantic, since Washington put forth his proclamation of neutrality, not the least of his titles to a pure as well as brilliant fame, has it not contracted, as it were, to a land's breadth? That same cross sea, that confluence of all winds and waves, through which the great pilot scarcely steered the ship of state, is there no danger that this, that worse than this, will strain our fastenings and rend away our sails, and carry our masts by the board? Shall any seamanship but the highest hold the helm in such a prospect?"

"Who does not see how difficult and delicate a part the New World may have to act? To observe neutrality steadfast and impartial, yet maintain our rank and fulfill our mission as the successful Republic, whose sound has gone into all nations; to keep peace in this war of giants, if such there shall be, yet so to cause our light to shine before all men, that all, seeing with what felicity, with what glory the people may rule themselves, may be stimulated to pass on the torch of liberty, till its radiant round encircles the world; to mete out public sympathy in time and measure, yet hold unbroken every tittle of the public code to which the repose of the world is intrusted? Such, so hard to reconcile, may be the trials of the next four years."

"To steer our course, not between Scylla and Charybdis, but across a whole archipelago of rocks, seen and unseen, who shall be our pilot? Who of our statesmen in circumstances more perplex than those of the administration of Washington may view a second time such praise, such envy as he extorted from all the world, even from the very beligerents who could not, or would not, adopt the wisdom of his policy? Does our partiality deceive us? or is it he, in whose intellectual and prudential character are so felicitously adjusted the antagonisms of conservatism and progress, institution and reform, liberty and law, the highest freedom compatible with the scheme of actual things on the one hand, and on the other, order, obedience, the sacredness of society, of property, and the rights of labor; who settled the boundary quarrel with England by his sense and temper, and put an end forever to the possibility of impressing a sailor from under the stars and stripes, by his spirit and argument; who rebuked the insolence of Austria, and will give the right hand of a nation's fellowship to Kossuth—yet raise no casus belli on which Hapsburg or the Czar could stand for a moment in the forum of States? Does our partiality deceive us, or is he the pilot for such a night on this sea?"

Mr. President, I agree perfectly with this distinguished gentleman, that we have both "a delicate and difficult part" to act as a nation at the present time. I admit most freely that it is our true policy, and not less our high moral duty, "to observe neutrality steadfast and impartial, yet maintain our rank and fulfill our mission as the successful Republic, whose sound has gone into all nations; to keep peace in this war of giants, if such there shall be, yet so to cause our light to shine before all men, that all, seeing with what felicity, with what glory, the people may rule themselves, may be stimulated to pass on the torch of liberty till its radiant round encircles the world; to mete out public sympathy in time and measure, yet hold unbroken every tittle of the public code to which the repose of the world is intrusted."

Sir, I subscribe heartily to every word and sentiment of this noble paragraph. Is it true, Mr. President—I hope that no gentleman upon the Whig side of the Chamber at least will be inclined to dispute it—that in Mr. Webster's "intellectual and prudential character are so felicitously adjusted the antagonisms of conservatism and progress, institution and reform, liberty and law, the highest freedom compatible with the scheme of actual things on the one hand, and on the other, order, obedience, the sacredness of society, of property, and the rights of labor?" Was it Mr. Webster "who settled the boundary question with England by his sense and temper, and put an end forever to the possibility of impressing a sailor from under the stars and stripes, by his spirit and argument; who rebuked the insolence of Austria, and will give the right hand of a nation's fellowship to Kossuth—yet raise no casus belli on which Hapsburg or the Czar could stand for a moment in the forum of States?" I repeat the question emphatically, Mr. President, (and in asking I turn to the Whig side of the House,) Is Mr. Webster deserving of all these commendations, and did I yet act indiscreetly in acting upon his advice? Is the Secretary of State in fact to extend "the right hand of a nation's fellowship to Kossuth?"—yet are we censurable for simply urging upon Congress the propriety of according to him an affectionate national welcome?

Mr. President, I shall have more to say of Mr. Webster (nothing, surely, in a spirit of unkindness or disrespect) towards the close of these desultory remarks, when I shall undertake to show, by evidence of a nature not to be successfully opposed, that many years since this gentleman, in a well-considered and most masterly speech, gave expression to what I have ever deemed the true American doctrine, in regard to the policy of this Government towards the despotic Powers of Europe, touching the right claimed by them of intervening forcibly in the domestic affairs of nations rightfully as independent in all respects as themselves, in order to suppress movements therein tending to the establishment of free institutions. I shall lay certain portions of the speech of this gentleman upon the Greek question, delivered during the administration of Mr. Monroe, before the Senate, and I expect to satisfy every dispassionate mind present, that even in the year 1823, language was held by one of the most conservative statesmen that this country has at any time produced, assuming as high and, as I think, even higher and bolder ground, in regard to the rights and duties of this Government to interpose, in a discreet and becoming manner, for the purpose of preventing the armed intervention of Russia, Prussia, and other Powers, for the suppression of the rising spirit of freedom in continental Europe. When I read these extracts, with a view to historic elucidation merely, I hope not to be accused of having in view the promotion of any public man whatever to Executive honors in 1852. With the presidential contest, now almost at hand, I expect to have no very close connection, and I shall do nothing in the progress of it whatever that I may not think necessary to the great Union cause, to which, for the present, I am specially devoted.

I shall proceed to make, at this time, some additional remarks in reply to the honorable Senator from Alabama, to whose speech on this occasion I listened with a chagrin difficult to be expressed. Sir, I will say nothing disrespectful of that gentleman. I could not do so without greatly wronging that sincere friendship and esteem which I cherish for him. Surely, sir, my friend from Alabama could not have dispassionately examined the delicate and interesting question before us anterior to his launching so boldly upon the ocean of controversy. The honorable gentleman seems to have formed a highly unfavorable opinion of the public character of the great Magyar chieftain, and has indulged in various remarks of a nature decidedly unkind and derogatory. He has read to us, too, sir, copious extracts from the columns of a newspaper which he held in his hands, most bitterly aspersive of the motives and conduct of this persecuted patriot. Whilst the honorable gentleman was thus entertaining us,

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1851.

NEW SERIES...No. 5.

I ventured to inquire of him the name of the newspaper thus specially honored, and was answered, as I expected to be, that it was the New York Courier and Enquirer. Sir, I had read in the same paper everything brought to our notice this morning by the honorable gentleman, and I had also read more than one overwhelming refutation of every slanderous allegation which this Thersites of the American press had dared to fulminate against the exalted object of his fiendish hostility. I shall not go into details on this head at present. It would be useless to do so; but I venture to asseverate, that there is not one criminatory accusation that James Watson Webb has presumed to publish against Governor Kossuth which has not been so effectually disproved, in other newspapers of New York, and by the adduction of testimony the authenticity of which no man of standing will dispute, as to cover the author of these heartless calumnies with the most lasting contempt. Does the honorable Senator from Alabama know who this James Watson Webb is? Why, this is the renowned personage who left the shores of America, early in the administration of General Taylor, under very peculiar circumstances, as Chargé to Vienna; and whose nomination was rejected by an indignant Senate with indications of scorn, such as have never been known to mark any similar transaction in our annals. Rumor says that only seven Senators could be induced to vote for his confirmation. I shall not undertake to trace out the history of this personage as the habitual promulgator of printed scandal, and as a mercenary and time-serving political parasite. It is, in my judgment, by no means to be regretted that Kossuth has escaped the laudations of the New York Courier and Enquirer. The exorbitant and unblushing eulogist of the bloody house of Hapsburg cannot but hate, with all the demoniac intensity of an evil nature, the man whose resplendent virtues and high achievements have caused him to be recognized throughout the world as peculiarly and preeminently qualified for the high part which Louis Kossuth is evidently destined to enact on the theatre of continental Europe, as the heroic avenger of long-suppressed freedom, and the chastiser of earth's haughtiest and most heartless tyrants.

Mr. President, I was not less surprised than mortified when I heard from the lips of the Senator from Alabama, the same erroneous views of the character of the Hungarian struggle, and of the conduct of Kossuth in connection therewith. If the honorable gentleman had taken pains to inform himself somewhat better in regard to the historic topics which he has discussed this morning with so much spirit, he would have been able to avoid the multiplied errors which he has committed, and the gross injustice which he has unwittingly done to Kossuth and his Hungarian associates. I can assure the gentleman that, when he shall hereafter have leisure for a more thorough exploration of the subject, he will discover with some surprise the grievous extent to which he has been misled by the ingenious fabrications to which he seems to have yielded the most implicit credence. If it should turn out in the progress of the debate to be at all necessary to bring forward here authentic evidence in refutation of the slanderous statements of the New York Courier and Enquirer, and no other Senator should find it convenient to do so, I may be tempted to assume the performance of this task. For the present I shall decline it, and proceed to notice several remarks which fell from the honorable Senator in regard to the circumstances connected with the coming of Kossuth to this country, and his conduct since he arrived upon our shores. The honorable gentleman denies that Kossuth is the guest of the nation, and contends that the language of the original joint resolution inviting him to this country, affords conclusive proof in refutation of this notion. This, it really seems to me, is a very strange position. The gentleman will not, surely, deny that the resolution did invite him to our shores, and that he is now here in accordance with that invitation, and brought hither, in part at least, in one of our national vessels, dispatched to the coast of Asia for the purpose of bringing this distinguished exile into our midst. He is in America, in some capacity or another, and at our invitation. This country has not yet been chosen as his permanent home, and we all know that he has long since explicitly announced his intention to return in a few weeks to Europe. I confess that I cannot understand how he can be otherwise than regarded as our guest, towards whom we are bound, in every form, to exercise the rites of a cordial hospitality. The gentleman says that inasmuch as the resolution inviting him hither describes him as a person supposed by us to be desirous of emigrating and settling permanently among us, and, inasmuch as he has now concluded not to abandon his own country permanently, he is not at all entitled to be considered "the guest of the nation." Well, sir, it does seem to me that the honorable gentleman's philological explanations are of a most unsatisfactory character, and such as hardly demand more than the passing notice already bestowed upon them.

The Senator from Alabama is greatly dissatisfied with the language employed by Governor Kossuth on several occasions since his arrival in this country, and especially with his reply to the Philadelphia committee. The gentleman says:

"When the news reached Governor Kossuth that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi had been withdrawn, he saw proper to become highly offended, and assumed to deliver a lecture upon the conduct of Congress."

Sir, I have seen no such lecture; I have seen no proof of Governor Kossuth's becoming offended with the action of Congress at all; nor, in my judgment, did the printed extract read from Governor Kossuth's reported address to the Philadelphia committee at all warrant the description now given of it by the honorable gentleman. He expressed his regret simply, in decorous and respectful language, that Congress had hesitated about according him a national reception, and added:

"Had I known that in the same place, where I was invited to this country by an act of Congress, the same body would now decline to bid me a welcome, I would have thought that I was not a welcome guest."

Why, sir, surely if Congress should refuse to bid him welcome, he could not do otherwise than come to the conclusion that he was not welcome. If we refuse to welcome him, will he be welcomed by us? And if thus refused a welcome, will he have a right still to regard himself as welcome? He ventures to add, that had he anticipated this refusal of welcome, he "would not have wished to intrude." Certainly, sir, this language is exceedingly proper and not at all disrespectful in its character. What gentleman in the world would wish to intrude under the circumstances stated?

Again: the gentleman insists that the intention of Kossuth is to involve us in European war. I hope not, sir; and I must confess that I have seen not the least evidence yet of his entertaining any such intention. He has certainly, on many occasions, most explicitly disavowed any such design; and I hold in my hand a New York newspaper, in which is published an authorized declaration from him, which reads as follows:

"The impression having gone out through some of the public journals, that the purpose of Governor Kossuth aims at a forcible intervention in foreign affairs, we take leave to say, on authority, that such is not the fact. He asks simply that England and America shall unite in affirming the policy that 'every nation shall have the right to make and alter its political institutions to suit its own condition and convenience,' and that the two nations (England and America) shall not only respect, but cause to be respected, this doctrine, so as to prevent Russia from again marching her armies into Hungary. He holds that there is a wide difference between a resolute attitude, powerful enough to prevent interference, and the going to war to repulse an intervention already commenced. Governor Kossuth has not intended to suggest that America should copy the example of France during our Revolution, according to the letter, but according to the spirit. The circumstances are widely different, and all that can be hoped is, that a great and free country like this should act in behalf of Freedom according to the time and the circumstances in which it is placed."

I am not prepared at this moment to express my views in regard to the true policy of this country at the present moment upon the delicate question herein referred to. That question, as has been repeatedly shown, does not at all arise upon this simple resolution of welcome, and I protest against this hasty and extemporaneous decision of a great question of national policy, which is entitled to a calm and extended examination at our hands, in all its grave and momentous bearings, and concerning which the ablest and most experienced statesmen of the Republic might well differ. Certain it is, that there are very distinguished gentlemen in this country who have avowed the opinion that a discreet and enlightened regard to our own safety and honor, as one of the independent nations of the earth, requires that we should, in some form or other, assert at this time, the acknowledged principle of international law, that "every nation shall have the right to make and alter its political institutions to suit its own condition and convenience." This principle is one of the utmost value in itself, and not less important to us than to other civilized nations; and it is undeniably true that movements have occurred within the last year or two, of a nature to call the validity of this principle into serious question, and which, if not in some way checked, must eventually subvert it forever. Sir, the views so forcibly presented by Governor Kossuth touching this point, are not now declared for the first time in this country. They have been long ago declared by some of our ablest and most conservative statesmen in the two Houses of Congress, in language of wonderful force and clearness, without, I believe, calling forth disapproval in any quarter. In proof of this, I beg leave to read in hearing of the Senate the extracts from the speech of the present Secretary of State, [Mr. WEBSTER,] upon the Greek question, in the year 1823, to which I referred in the beginning of these remarks. I shall not, on this occasion, declare my own entire sanction of the doctrines then asserted by Mr. Webster. Still less will I take it upon myself to denounce or to censure them; but I venture to assert, that Kossuth has neither gone further, nor is likely hereafter to go further, than did Mr. Webster during the calm and peaceful administration of Mr. Monroe, in asserting the policy of this country touching the attempts of the Allied Powers of Europe to intervene for the purpose of putting down republican governments newly springing into existence on that continent. It is thus that Mr. Webster expressed himself more than twenty-five years ago:

"I might well, Mr. Chairman, avoid the responsibility of this measure, if it had, in my judgment, any tendency to change the policy of the country. With the general course of that policy I am quite satisfied. The nation is prosperous, peaceful, and happy; and I should very reluctantly put its peace, prosperity, or happiness at risk. It appears to me, however, that this resolution is strictly conformable to our general policy, and not only consistent with our interests, but even demanded by a large and liberal view of those interests."

Again he says:

"It cannot be denied that the great political question of this age, is, that between absolute and regulated governments. The substance of the controversy is, whether society shall have any part in its own government. Whether the form of government shall be that of limited monarchy, with more or less mixture of hereditary power, or wholly elective, or representative, may perhaps be considered as subordinate. The main controversy is between that absolute rule, which, while it promises to govern well, means nevertheless to govern without control, and that regulated or constitutional system, which restrains sovereign discretion, and asserts that society may claim, as matter of right, some effective power in the establishment of the laws which are to regulate it. The spirit of the time sets with a most powerful current in favor of these last-mentioned opinions. It is opposed, however, whenever and wherever it shows itself, by certain of the great potentates of Europe; and it is opposed on grounds as applicable in one civilized nation as in another, and which would justify such opposition in relation to the United States, as well as in relation to any other State, or nation, if time and circumstance should render such opposition expedient."

"What part it becomes this country to take on a question of this sort, so far as it is called upon to take any part, cannot be doubtful. Our side of this question is settled for us even without our own volition. Our history, our situation, our character, necessarily decide our position and our course, before we have even time to ask whether we have an option. Our place is on the side of free institutions."

Further on, he thus continues:

"I will now, Mr. Chairman, advert to those pretensions, put forth by the allied sovereigns of continental Europe, which seem to me calculated, if unresisted, to bring into disrepute the principles of our Government, and indeed, to be wholly incompatible with any degree of national independence. I do not introduce these considerations for the sake of topics. I am not about to declaim against crowned heads, nor to quarrel with any country for preferring a form of government different from our own. The choice that we exercise for ourselves I am quite willing to leave also to others, but it appears to me that the pretensions of which I have spoken are wholly inconsistent with the independence of nations generally, without regard to the question whether their governments be absolute, monarchical, and limited, or purely popular and representative. I have a most deep and thorough conviction that a new era has risen in the world, that new and dangerous combinations are taking place, promulgating doctrines and fraught with consequences wholly subversive in their tendency, of the public law of nations, and of the general liberties of mankind. Whether this be so or not, is the question which I now propose to examine, upon such grounds of information as the common and public means of knowledge disclose."

Mr. Webster then proceeds to examine, and to comment with great freedom and boldness upon various public documents, bearing evidence of the formal combination which had been entered into by the despotic Powers of Europe against free institutions, and gives expression to the following generous sentiments:

"But the second, and, if possible, the still more objectionable principle, avowed in these papers, is the right of forcible interference in the affairs of other States. A right to control nations in their desire to change their own government, wherever it may be conjectured, or pretended, that such change might furnish an example to the subjects of other States, is plainly and distinctly asserted. The same Congress that made the declaration at Laybach, had declared, before its removal from Troppan, 'that the Powers have an undoubted right to take a hostile attitude in regard to those States in which the overthrow of the government may operate as an example.'

"There cannot, as I think, be conceived a more flagrant violation of public law, or national independence, than is contained in this declaration.

"No matter what be the character of the government resisted; no matter what weight the foot of the oppressor bears on the neck of the oppressed; if he struggle, or if he complain, he sets a dangerous example of resistance—and from that moment he becomes an object of hostility to the most powerful potentates on the earth. I want words to express my abhorrence of this abominable principle."

But, Mr. President, it seems that we are now urged by certain honorable Senators to be exceedingly cautious how we receive Kossuth, or hazard a declaration of opinions which may by possibility give offence to the Emperor of Russia. We are urged to do nothing that can possibly have the effect of wounding his delicate sensibilities. Well, sir, if I thought that the language of manly indignation uttered by members of this body could awaken the least remorse or mortification in the ice-bound bosom of this potential personage, and constrain him, for a single moment, to open the portals of his iron heart to the throbbings of a genial sympathy towards the millions whom he has so cruelly oppressed, and the hundreds of thousands whom he has so ruthlessly slaughtered in Hungary and in Poland, I should even be willing to continue this debate a day or two longer, as fatiguing and disagreeable as it has certainly become to those participating in it, and as offensive and disgusting as it has also become to the whole country. But to return to Mr. Webster's speech. He says, in relation to the principle of forcible intervention:

"I trust every enlightened man throughout the world will oppose it, and that especially, those who, like ourselves, are fortunately out of the reach of the bayonets that enforce it, will proclaim their detestation of it in a tone both loud and decisive. The avowed object of such declarations is to preserve the peace of the world. But by what means is it proposed to preserve this peace? Simply, by bringing the power of all governments to bear against all subjects. Here is to be established a sort of double, or treble, or quadruple, or, for aught I know, a quintuple allegiance. An offence against one king is to be an offence against all kings, and the power of all is to be put forth for the punishment of the offender. A right to interfere in extreme cases, in the case of contiguous States, and where imminent danger is threatened to one by what is transpiring in another, is not without precedent in modern times, upon what has been called the law of vicinage; and when confined to extreme cases, and limited to a certain extent, it may perhaps be defended upon principles of necessity and self-defence. But to maintain that sovereigns may go to war upon the subjects of another State to repress an example, is monstrous indeed. What is to be the limit of such a principle, or to the practice growing out of it? What, in any case, but sovereign pleasure is to decide whether the example be good or bad? And what, under the operation of such a rule, may be thought of our example? Why are we not as fair objects for the operation of the new principle, as any of those who may attempt to reform the condition of their Government, on the other side of the Atlantic?"

An extract or two more, and I am done:

"This asserted right of forcible intervention, in the affairs of other nations, is in open violation of the public law of the world. Who has authorized these learned doctors of Troppan to establish new articles in this code? Whence are their diplomas? Is the whole world expected to acquiesce in principles which entirely subvert the independence of nations? On the basis of this independence has been reared the beautiful fabric of international law. On the principle of this independence, Europe has seen a family of nations flourishing within its limits—the small among the large—protected not always by power, but by a principle above power—by a sense of propriety and justice. On this principle the great commonwealth of civilized States has been hitherto upheld. There have been occasional departures, or violations, and always disastrous, as in the case of Poland; but, in general, the harmony of the system has been wonderfully preserved. In the production and preservation of this sense of justice, this predominate principle, the Christian religion has acted a main part. Christianity and civilization have labored together; it seems, indeed, to be a law of our human condition, that they can live and flourish only together. From their blended influence has arisen that delightful spectacle of the prevalence of reason and principle, over power and interest, so well described by one who was an honor to the age—

'And sovereign Law, the world's collected will,
'O'er thrones and globes elate,
Sits Empress—crowning good, repressing ill:
Smit by her sacred frown,
The fiend, Discretion, like a vapor, sinks,
And e'en the all-dazzling crown
Hides his faint rays, and at her bidding shrinks.'

But this vision is past. While the teachers of Laybach give the rule, there will be no law but the law of the strongest.

"It may now be required of me to show what interest we have in resisting this new system. What is it to us, it may be asked, upon what principles, or what pretences, the European governments assert a right of interfering in the affairs of their neighbors? The thunder, it may be said, rolls at a distance. The wide Atlantic is between us and danger; and, however others may suffer, we shall remain safe.

"I think it a sufficient answer to this to say, that we are one of the nations; that we have an interest, therefore, in the preservation of that system of national law and national intercourse, which has heretofore subsisted, so beneficially for all. Our system of government, it should also be remembered, is, throughout, founded on principles utterly hostile to the new code; and, if we remain undisturbed by its operation, we shall owe our security either to our situation or our spirit. The enterprising character of the age, our own active commercial spirit, the great increase which has taken place in the intercourse between civilized and commercial States, have necessarily connected us with the nations of the earth, and given us a high concern in the preservation of those salutary principles, upon which that intercourse is founded. We have as clear an interest in international law, as individuals have in the laws of society.

"But, apart from the soundness of the policy, on the ground of direct interest, we have, sir, a duty connected with this subject, which, I trust, we are willing to perform. What do we not owe to the cause of civil and religious liberty? to the principle of lawful resistance? to the principle that society has a right to partake in its own government? As the leading Republic of the world, living and breathing in these principles, and advanced, by their operation, with unequalled rapidity in our career, shall we give our consent to bring them into disrepute and disgrace? It is neither ostentation nor boasting to say, that there lie before this country, in immediate prospect, a great extent and height of power. We are borne along towards this, without effort, and not always even with a full knowledge of the rapidity of our own motion. Circumstances, which never combined before, have combined in our favor, and a mighty current is setting us forward, which we could not resist, even if we would, and which, while we would stop to make an observation, and take the sun, has set us, at the end of the operation, far in advance of the place where we commenced it. Does it not become us, then—is it not a duty imposed on us—to give our weight to the side of liberty and justice—to let mankind know that we are not tired of our own institutions—and to protest against the asserted power of altering, at pleasure, the law of the civilized world?"

Mr. President, I cannot conclude without expressing the deep regret which I feel that circumstances should have arisen of a nature to make it apparently necessary that so much should be said in defence of a movement which, I do not doubt, will be warmly approved by nine tenths of the free and enlightened citizens of this great Republic. I hope that we may soon come to a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. BERRIEN. The question is on the amendment which I have had the honor of submitting to the Senate. It contains two propositions. First, it proposes to extend this welcome to the associates of Governor Kossuth. And secondly, disclaims the purpose which is there stated. I apprehend, therefore, that the Chair will concur with me that it is susceptible of division.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly. The amendment contains two distinct propositions, and the question can be taken separately upon each.

Mr. BERRIEN. At the suggestion of Senators, then, I ask that the question may be divided.

The PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the first branch of the amendment:

"And be it further resolved, That the welcome thus offered to Louis Kossuth be extended to his associate Hungarian exiles who have landed upon our shores."

Mr. SEWARD. I see no objection to that proposition, and if it will commend the main resolution to the favor of the Senator, I shall very cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. BERRIEN asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I wish to make an explanation, lest my vote on this amendment may place me in a wrong attitude. I thought that some special respect was due to Governor Kossuth over and above his associates. On that account I shall vote against the amendment, with the view of making this a special compliment to Kossuth.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. If it is adopted it will derogate very much from the original intention. I hold that his associates are entitled to this honor; but as we commenced with Kossuth himself, we ought to confine it to him, regarding him as the representative of Hungary and as the representative of liberty.

Mr. BADGER. It seems to me that my friend from Illinois makes a mistake, and that the premises from which he argues lead to a conclusion directly opposite that at which he arrived. We commenced by the joint resolution of the last session. We commenced with "Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity." The Senator says he wishes to follow up as we began. How is that to be done by leaving out the associates of Kossuth?

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. The gentleman forgets that we only included these associates in the proposition of release, and that this is intended as a cordial welcome to one who is entitled to be recognized as the personification, the embodiment of liberty beyond the rolling ocean.

Mr. BERRIEN. We did not merely unite the associates of Kossuth with him in the proposal of a release from captivity, but we united them in inviting to our shores and preparing the means of transit.

Mr. BADGER. Every word of the original resolution which applies to Kossuth applies to his associates.

Mr. CASS said: Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] not because the fellow-sufferers of the illustrious Hungarian leader are not worthy of respect and commiseration everywhere, but simply because he comes here as the representative of a great principle, and I do not desire to have our testimonial in its favor weakened by the introduction of other names or topics. We all know the effect of amendment after amendment upon a resolution, and how easily its character and objects are changed by such proceedings. For myself, I shall adhere to the purpose we have in view.

Mr. President, I intended to say something upon this subject, and I may as well say it now upon the question before the Senate. This discussion has taken a very wide range—a very discursive range. I shall not follow it in its ramifications; but there are some observations which I wish briefly to offer to the Senate.

Now, with respect to the invitation from Congress to Kossuth, I am not going to enter into any critical analysis of it; I am not going to enter into any philological examination of its words. It is idle to say that we invited him as an ordinary emigrant, to come here to enter his one hundred and sixty acres of land and take up his residence in the forest.

To be sure, the word "emigrants" is used in the original resolution, but our attention was fixed upon the leader and his patriotic band, not because we sought them for the usual purposes of emigration, but because he had been an apostle and had become a martyr of liberty, and we desired to honor the cause and to honor the man; and we were truly anxious to rescue all these interesting sufferers from the evils of captivity, and the still greater evils impending over them, should Mohammedan hospitality be compelled to yield to Christian menaces. We invited the great leader of a great revolution to come among us; one who had performed a noble part in the history of his country, in the history, indeed, of the human race. It was an imposing procedure on our part. It was, and was intended to be, a testimonial from the Congress of the United States, to a great man and a holy cause. Why, it went forth to the world as a homage from a great Republic to a principle, which is the corner-stone of its own institutions, and was announced in every journal from California to Siberia, wherever an iron despotism has not placed its foot upon the press. It was a most imposing legislative act. The arrival of the vessel we sent on this grateful mission upon the old Homeric waters of the Hellespont was heralded by the announcement of the fact to all the world. And a proud day it was for us, and I trust, for human liberty, when these hope-deferred exiles trod the deck of freedom, and found the ensign of a great and free people waving over them. Then, and not till then, were they safe.

And are we now to mar this beautiful page of our history, this tribute to patriotism and freedom, by saying that we merely invited a party of unfortunate Hungarians, as "emigrants," to our shores, and there they have landed, and there we leave them? They came as emigrants, and let them settle as such. And do we seek to prove by a philological examination of the invitation, merely, in fact, it would appear, to please two despotic monarchs, that we meant no honor to Kossuth, none to his companions, none to the cause to which they have devoted themselves? Why, sir, the common instincts of every man revolt against such a perversion. He came under no such circumstances. He came an exile, indeed, but admired and revered, wherever liberty has found an abiding-place, or wherever sincere but secret aspirations ascend to Heaven for its enjoyment. Such were the condition and claims of Kossuth. I regretted very much to hear upon this floor words of reproach, both against him and the revolution of his country. He needs no eulogy from me. He will find that in the hearts of mankind and in the voice of History. His name will go down to posterity, imprinting his character and principles upon the generation among which his great deeds have been done. Every age of the world is marked by the advent of peculiar individuals, who seem designed by Providence to perform a distinguished part in the concerns of the world. This age is marked by the deeds of Kossuth. Why, sir, there must be some great fascination about this wanderer, without power, without wealth, without a country. Such processions as those, that have welcomed his arrival both here and in England, have scarcely been seen in the world, since the pageants of Roman triumphs. No man can receive such voluntary homage from a free people, without possessing some of the highest qualities of our nature. Did he not, his presence would soon dissolve the enchantment, and reduce him to his true dimensions. But enthusiasm seems to increase as he becomes better known, and all join in tendering to him the tribute of admiration.

A good deal has been said about the revolution of Hungary, and a good deal in disparagement of it. I shall not follow these assaults to repel them. It would be a work of supererogation in this country. I will say, however, that it was a great and noble effort, worthy of the descendants of that band of heroes, who, centuries ago, upon the frontier of Christendom upheld the banner of the Cross against the standard of the Prophet of Mecca. It is objected here, that the Hungarians began their revolution with professions of loyalty to the Austrian crown and of attachment to the Austrian empire; that they asked but little at first, and that they avowed their determination not to be separated from their common country; and all this is brought forward here as a charge and a proof of inconsistency and insincerity. Well, sir, this is almost a chapter taken out of our own revolutionary history—almost a narrative of events and feelings in our own country, connected with the origin and progress of our struggle with England. The resemblance, not to say the identity, is remarkable. What did our revolutionary fathers do? They, too, began with declarations of attachment to the English crown and people, and it is a historical truth beyond contradiction, that they did not desire separation, and they at first condemned it as a great evil. If the Hungarians boasted, as is here said, that they were the firmest supporters of the Austrian power, and had freely shed their blood in its defence, did not the noble patriots who conducted us through our stormy and perilous crisis, did they not boast in like manner, that they had shown their attachment to England by fighting her battles in the wars of 1745 and 1760, and had taken efficient parts in the capture of the Havana, of Louisbourg, and of Quebec, and in the annihilation of the French power upon this Continent? So began the contest, but sufferings and sacrifices on one side, and cruelty and oppression on the other, soon changed all these feelings, and converted sincere friendship into deadly enmity. And such is the natural course of all revolutions. They generally commence with moderate demands, but soon change their character and seek the permanent establishment of independence. Concessions, which would at first have been received with gratitude, are afterwards spurned with contempt, and the struggling party rises in its hopes and expectations in proportion to its own exertions and to the prospects of success. I repeat, it is human nature. Attempts at subjugation produce their necessary consequences—enmity and alienation. Now, sir, I do hope we shall hear no more of Hungarian inconsistency and insincerity; because little was asked at first and much afterwards; for we cannot hear it without being sensible that the same accusation may be made against Washington and his associates, whom we all love and honor. This has been precisely the course of all men, who have had to fight the battles of freedom, since human rights first contended against human despotism.

Mr. President, what is the object of the present proceeding?—I refer now to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] as it is more comprehensive than the one offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and better opens the whole subject. But by-and-by I shall briefly consider the latter. What, I repeat, is the object of this proceeding? It is to express the interest of the American people and their representatives in the glorious cause, aye, and in the glorious fate of this great Hungarian leader. What was that resolution of the Senator from Mississippi? It was substantially an expression of "sympathy" for a people "unfurling the banners of freedom," in the beautiful words of Washington; and these words furnish a precedent, which I hope the Senators from Georgia and Kentucky [Mr. BARNIER and Mr. UNDERWOOD] will consider sufficiently authoritative to enable them to join us upon this occasion in expressing the sympathy of our countrymen, as the same feeling was expressed by the first and greatest of our Chief Magistrates in the heroic age of the Republic. What have nations a right to do—a real practical right to do—under the circumstances, in which we are placed? That is the true question, divested of all the fears, whose anticipations have here fallen from eloquent tongues, but I trust upon unbelieving ears. Why, sir, every nation has the right to open wide its doors, and to receive, with welcome and kindness, all the victims of oppression, who, seeking to free their country from despotism, encounter the disastrous chances of a revolution, and are compelled to seek safety by flight. These unfortunate men are received and protected by every Government under heaven, except where excluded by the joint stipulations of some of those iron-hearted rulers, whose vengeance nothing but human blood will satisfy, and who desire to cut off all means of escape from homeless, houseless patriots. The moment a revolution is put down, those who have taken part in it, flee elsewhere, if they can, for protection. In Europe they find refuge in France and England. There are at this moment, some half a dozen wandering pretenders, whom revolutionary events have expelled or withheld from thrones, and who are roaming through Europe, protected by its various Governments. England, at one time, afforded an asylum to the refugees of two, if not of three, revolutions. I am not sure, that the representative of the Bourbon family was there when Louis Philippe was overthrown, but Louis Philippe himself, and those, who led to the revolution, that dethroned him, and were the victims of another struggle, found themselves in England at the same time, quietly enjoying the protection of her laws. Who ever complained that a place of refuge was thus found for the unfortunate? And yet, what is the importance of a small band of exiles upon a distant continent to the real presence and protection of him who claims, by the grace of God, the government of a country? If the former is justly offensive, I should like to know what the latter is? If this poor privilege of escape were taken away, you would shut up, within a condemned district, every man under the ban of his rulers, and you would make each of the despotic countries of Europe one vast slaughter-house; and still more, you would destroy the very germs of liberty, throughout a vast portion of the world. But still further, the Governments of Europe appropriate money to defray the expenses of strangers, thus thrown upon their hospitality. The British Government has done this, and so has the Government of France, and to a large amount, for exiles, who have taken refuge there. It is a well-known fact, that the banished pretenders to several of the European thrones, have been aided, if not wholly supported, by the contributions of their monarchical brethren, who have been fortunate enough to retain their positions. And are we to refrain from even the poor tribute of expressing our sympathy for these interesting strangers, who come among us—these patriotic exiles, because we are republicans, and they desire their countrymen to become such? No one complains of monarchical sympathy! Let no man in this free country complain of the republican expression of it. It is futile to talk about intervention. There is no intervention in all this.

I suppose it would be a much more offensive proceeding to a persecuting government to have the subjects of its wrath protected and maintained, than would be a mere expression of sympathy in their misfortunes.

Mr. President, there is a great principle, which no one can deny, and that is, that in the internal contests of other countries, where one portion of a community is endeavoring to throw off an iron yoke, the other Powers of the earth have no right to interfere. England, and her continental allies, violated this salutary prohibition, in the invasion of France, towards the commencement of her revolution, and signally was this breach of duty rebuked and punished by triumphant armies, who carried the tri-colored flag from Lisbon to Moscow. As far as I understand, this is the very ground taken by Kossuth in his various answers and addresses, conceived, I must say, in the genuine spirit of eloquence. He is willing to abide the issue of the efforts of the Hungarians, if they are left to contend with the power of Austria alone. It may be, that in the many and extemporaneous answers he is compelled to make, he has not always laid down the precise limitations; but the general purport is sufficiently manifest, and, sir, I fully agree with him in this view. Russia and Austria have violated this great salutary principle. The latter, hard-pressed by the gallant Hungarians, invoked the aid of the Autocrat, and the Cossacks poured over the frontiers, and prostrated in the dust the banner of freedom. Now, what may other nations rightfully do under such circumstances? The law of nations is the bond, which unites all civilized communities together; which protects, not always, unfortunately, but often, the weak against the strong—the arbiter which substitutes reason for force. Every country under heaven has an interest in its immunity and preservation.

If, then, one of its great principles is violated, what may other nations rightfully do? Why, sir, the answer is easy and clear. If any nation believes its own interest is so much affected by this violation, and that it is so grave in its character as to justify it, it may resort to that remedy at its discretion. It has the moral right to appeal to that final arbiter in the disputes among independent Powers. Whether it will take that serious step is a question for its own decision, depending upon its view of its own interest and policy.

But there are other methods, than war, by which the feelings and disapprobation of the impartial Governments of the world may be expressed. They may make a public and solemn protest against the proceeding, placing upon historic record their disapproval of this conduct, and avowing their determination never to assent to the consequences of such acts, nor to the doctrines they establish. Or they may remonstrate, in a diplomatic form, through their own representative, in terms more or less severe and decided, as the gravity of the circumstances and the interests involved may render proper; or the whole subject may be discussed, and the course condemned in the legislative bodies of other Governments, as is done in France, in England, and in the United States. The public opinion of the world is a powerful engine in its social and political systems; and though not always strong enough to prevent injustice, it is never without a salutary effect. It cannot be wholly shut out from the most despotic countries, and it has often made the tyrant tremble on his throne. And the halls of free legislation are the very places, whence this warning voice may issue to perform its work. It seems to have been assumed in this discussion, that if we remonstrate against infractions of the law of nations—against this high-handed violation, for example, by Russia and Austria—that we must be prepared to support our declaration by war—that, in truth, the act itself pledges us to war. Why, sir, no error can be greater or more mischievous. The protests and remonstrances of nations are everyday occurrences in the diplomatic history of the world. England put upon record her protest against the occupation of Cracow, to record in all time her disapprobation of that act of violence and injustice. But she rested there. She did not think the circumstances called for war. And within the current year, it is known that both France and England made representations against the demand of Russia and Austria, that the Sultan should deliver up to their tender mercies the unfortunate Hungarian exiles. What the protesting States would have done, had this insolent demand succeeded, we do not know. It did not necessarily follow, that they would go to war. But it would be time ill spent to multiply instances in illustration of this doctrine. Modern history is full of them, and they are familiar to all. I repeat, that what we shall do, in cases where we find it necessary to pursue this mode of expressing our disapprobation, is a mere question of policy; and if we do nothing but put ourselves right by this process of a disapproval, we compromise neither our dignity nor our honor. We put our views upon record, and then we are free to act at any time thereafter, as we please.

I take it for granted, that there is not a sane man in this country who dreams even of intervening by force in this affair—of sending a fleet to cover the Adriatic, and to blockade the lagoons of old Venice, and the port of Trieste, or another to take its station on the Sound, and close the entrance of the Baltic to the ships of Russia. It is not physical force that every true lover of his country would desire to employ on this occasion. It is moral force; that powerful lever in the affairs of the world, which sooner or later will do its work. Like truth, it is mighty and will prevail. Let not gentlemen, therefore, be alarmed at the proposed expression of sympathy and interest. It may keep alive the hopes of oppressed millions in Europe to know that their condition and prospects receive the warm regard of the great Republic, which in the new hemisphere has preceded them in the struggle for freedom, and now reaps the reward; and in doing this, we keep ourselves still in the pale of the law of nations, and give just cause of offence to no one.

Mr. President, eloquent allusions have been made here to the ominous condition of Europe. And truly it is sufficiently threatening to fix the regard of the rest of the civilized world. Elements are at work there, whose contact and contest must ere long produce explosions, whose consequences no man can foresee. The cloud may as yet be no bigger than a man's hand, like that seen by the prophet from Mount Carmel, but it will overspread the whole hemisphere and burst perhaps in ruins upon the social and political systems of the Old World. Antagonistic principles are doing their work there. The conflict cannot be avoided. The desire of man to govern himself, and the determination of rulers to govern him, are now face to face, and must meet in the strife of action, as they have met in the strife of opinion. It requires a wiser or a rasher man than I am, to undertake to foretell when and how this great battle will be fought; but it is as sure to come, as is the Sun to rise again, which is now descending to the horizon. What the free governments of the world may find it proper to do, when this great struggle truly begins, I leave to those upon whom will devolve the duty and the responsibility of decision. Even if I had the right, I have no disposition, to lay down the course, which the great interests of humanity may require the then established governments of the people to adopt. How far they will maintain by protest or remonstrance, or how far they will maintain by actual force, the inviolability of the law of nations, or what other intervention they may find it expedient to adopt, can only be determined when the exigency arises. For myself, I would leave our successors unshackled by any declaration upon this grave subject, and I consider it unwise to prejudice either the circumstances, or the course which they may then impose upon us.

An auditor listening to the progress of this discussion might naturally suppose, that our proceedings would be followed by vials of wrath to be poured out by Europe upon our unfortunate country, to which the plagues of Egypt were but a gentle shower, compared to the tornado of the tropics. These observations have relation to the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] and I have endeavored to show, that its adoption would give no just cause of offence to any Government whatever. But they apply with still more force to the resolution submitted by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] which simply says to the Hungarian Patriot, You are welcome to our country. And is it possible, that one member of this body can be found, who sees anything offensive in this expression of regard, or anticipates the slightest danger from the procedure? If there is, let him console himself. Would that we were as secure against all other evils, as we should be against the wrath of European sovereigns for this act of hospitality; if we were, our Government would endure, till all human governments shall have fulfilled their functions and disappeared.

I prefer the original resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, and regret that he found it necessary to withdraw it. I trust, however, that it will be renewed. My next choice is the one offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] but if neither of these can pass, I shall then vote for the proposition of the Senator from New York. That, I have said, is a mere welcome, tendered to our guest; and really, sir, I cannot treat with becoming gravity, the fear that its adoption is to raise a storm of indignation against our country, which is almost to blot us out from the record of nations. Never could cause and effect be more disproportionate.

The honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] proposes an amendment, which is to rescue us from our perilous condition, by making a declaration, which decrees that we declare nothing by this otherwise pregnant resolution. It is a sort of pronunciamento, if I may so say, which is to announce our true object, and to serve as the exclusion of a conclusion, when the Russian and Austrian Cabinets come to consider this grave measure, so directly affecting the rights and honor of their sovereigns. It is a kind of abstract announcement of our policy, appended to one of the most harmless procedures, that ever took place in our legislation.

Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to this careful regard of the susceptibilities of European arbitrary monarchs. It becomes neither us, nor the great people we in part represent. It is said, indeed, that we are in effect using threats towards the crowned heads, who rule over Russia and Austria. A most prolific engine of mischief is this same resolution. Our countrymen have too much regard for the character and position of our country to approve of the use of menacing language by their servants to other Powers, or to suffer it to be used to them. These are all chimeras, which I am sure a little reflection will dispel. Let us stand fast to our dignity, our character, and our principles. That is no threat; and if it be taken as such by the Autocrat of Russia, or by anybody else, so be it. Let him follow his own course, and seek his own remedy.

This proposed amendment is a sort of appeal to the good-will of these monarchs, saying in substance, Take no offence, for we mean none. The resolution does not pledge us to do you any injury, and we mean to let Hungarian affairs take care of themselves. Well, sir, it appears to me, that all this is uncalled-for, undignified, and unworthy of the representatives of the sovereign States of this Union. It shall never receive my assent.

The old well-known spectre of precedents has been revived. I hope that the two honorable Senators, who have opposed our action on this account, will see in the precedent of General Washington the true principles of this case. I would ask the Senator from Georgia, if the time has not arrived, when we may set precedents for those, who are to follow us, as they have been set by those who preceded us.

It has been well said, that the existing generation stands upon the shoulders of its predecessors; its visual horizon is enlarged from this elevation. We have the experience of those, who have gone before us, and our own, too. We are able to judge for ourselves, without blindly following in their footsteps. There is nothing stationary in the world. Moral and intellectual, as well as physical sciences, are in a state of progress; or, rather, we are marching onwards in the investigation of their true principles. It is presumptuous at any time to say, that now is the best possible condition of human nature; let us sit still and be satisfied; there is nothing more to learn. I believe in no such doctrine. I believe we are always learning. We have a right to examine for ourselves. In fact, it is our duty to do so. Still, sir, I would not rashly reject the experience of the world, any more than I would blindly follow it. I have no such idea. I have no wish to prostrate all the barriers raised by wisdom, and to let in upon us an inundation of many such opinions, as have been promulgated in the present age; but far be it from me to adopt as a principle of conduct, that nothing is to be done except what has been done before, and precisely as it was then done. So much for precedents.

Sir, a most extraordinary spectacle is this day presented in the American Senate—extraordinary, I mean, when compared with what took place not long since in one of those old regions, which were the cradle and threaten to become the tomb of civilization. The comparison of our course with that of the Sultan of Turkey is far from being flattering to our national vanity. I am apprehensive, that the nations of the world will wonder at our timidity. Here we are halting, hesitating, doubting; afraid to express our approbation of a great principle, even in the guise of a mere hospitable barren welcome. And was the conduct of the Successor of the Prophet marked by such vacillation, when he was insolently required to deliver those relics of a revolution to their relentless enemies, that they might expire upon an Austrian scaffold, or suffer worse than death from Siberia and the knout? He nobly answered, "No; they have eaten my salt, and by the faith of the Prophet not a hair of their heads shall be touched." And if he had been driven—if the successor of the Othmans had been driven to unfurl the standard of Mahomet, and to defend his dominions and the sacred rights of mankind at the head of his armies, every true American would have bid him God speed, and would have prayed for his success in upholding the doctrines of Christianity against the persecuting spirit of self-styled Christian rulers. I think that his rejection of the demands of these too great Powers, one of which touches his open frontier for hundreds of miles, while the other is always ready to pour its myrmidons from the heights of the Balkan and to drive him from Constantinople across the Bosphorus,—I say I think his course upon this occasion was one of the most remarkable instances of firmness, that the world has lately seen. I give him credit for it, and still the more, when I see with what cautious deliberation intelligent freemen explore this subject, and how unwilling they are to move when there is in truth "nothing to make us afraid."

There is another circumstance connected with this matter, of a very different character, but scarcely less extraordinary. Here is a subject presented to Congress in the gravest form by the President, in his annual message, a document everywhere read through the civilized world. He asks our special attention to it, and a resolution is introduced, as an honorable Senator has publicly stated—and no man ever doubted his word—at the instance of the Secretary of State, to give effect to the President's recommendation; and yet we see gentlemen of the same political party opposing the whole proceeding, with zeal amounting almost to warmth, because it may give offence to other Powers. The high officers specially charged with our foreign relations, and who ought best to understand the bearing of this proposition upon them, tell us by their conduct, that the proposition is right. No injury can result from it, nor will any one have just cause of complaint. I repeat, that the circumstance is a very extraordinary one, and far beyond my comprehension. The Executive says, by the nature of his communication, there is no danger in all this; while our ears are assailed with Jeremiads, almost proclaiming the downfall of our institutions. There seems to be a curious conversion going on. Upon this question, the President is abandoned by his own party and supported by ours. Well, sir, the President is right, and for once I am an Administration man. I go for the movement, heart, soul, and body. I have no fear of the consequences, and if I know my countrymen, they would defend the sacred cause of free opinion and action, if assailed, against all the Powers of the earth.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, the question which is before the Senate is upon the first branch of the amendment which I had the honor to submit. While that is the question, it is the only proper subject of discussion. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] has traversed the whole ground of the original resolution. I am not disposed to follow him in that discursive course, but he has addressed certain of his observations especially to myself; and upon these I desire to make a few brief remarks.

The Senator from Michigan inquires emphatically from me, whether we at this day have not a right to make a precedent. I am disposed to answer the question with a frank simplicity, and with a distinct affirmation of the proposition itself. Unquestionably we have a right, in the administration of the affairs of this Government, to do any act which in our judgment the circumstances which surround us may require; and if those circumstances have not previously existed, by the performance of the act which establishes a precedent. But how, I beg to ask the Senator from Michigan, did this doctrine of precedents come into this discussion? Was it introduced by the opponents of the resolution? Was it introduced by the advocates of the amendment? No, sir. The original movers of this resolution sought to rest upon the foundation of precedent, and what we have said upon the subject of precedent has been merely to show that the foundation upon which they propose to erect the superstructure was an unavailing attempt. If the circumstances of the case justify the act which you are about to perform, no man denies the right to make a precedent. We have not objected to a precedent, if the circumstances justify it; but when you have sought to arrest this proposition upon the basis of precedent, we have said to you that the circumstances do not justify it; that you are counteracting an established policy of your country. The amendment which I have offered was presented with a view of enabling Senators to place themselves distinctly before the country in affirmation or denial of the established policy of this Government.

The honorable gentleman talks of timidity—of an apprehension of exciting the indignation of the Powers which are to be prevented from interfering in the particular affairs of Hungary. He speaks of the fear which gentlemen seem to entertain; the alarm which he seems to think animates them at the prospect of war. I beg to say to that honorable gentleman, that I have not been influenced by any consideration of timidity; that the question, whether this shall excite the indignation of foreign powers, does not in the slightest degree actuate me; and that the apprehension of war itself, whenever my country shall be placed in a situation in which her interests and her honor may require that she should take that last resort, I will meet it with as little apprehension of its consequences as the honorable Senator from Michigan, or any individual who may avow indifference to such a result. No, sir; the motive by which I have been actuated is not timidity—not a consideration of the influence which this may have upon the minds of those whom it is proposed we shall restrain; not a fear of the consequences of any just and rightful war in which we may be involved; but a regard to the essential interests of my own country, and a solemn conviction that you do not present those circumstances which authorize you to put at hazard the vital interests of the country. That is the ground upon which I have presented this proposition; that is the ground upon which I have resisted the passage of this resolution.

But, sir, the question which is immediately before the Senate is upon the first branch of the amendment which I have submitted; and it is upon that question that I desire to have an expression of the senatorial will. Will you make this an insulated compliment to Governor Kossuth? Will you consider him as the sole individual who is entitled to your cordial welcome, or will you include with him those Hungarian patriots in subordinate situations, who have struggled with a devotion to freedom as ardent as his own in this great cause? Or are you disposed, by voting against this branch of the amendment, to exclude those Hungarian patriots, who, like Governor Kossuth, periled life, fortune, all, in the maintenance of the principles for which they contended? Why will you make this distinction? I shall not at this moment turn you to the words of the original invitation, but I ask you—considering it as a perfectly new case—as a question unaffected by any preceding action—suppose this question now presented to you: Here are upon our shores a body of Hungarian patriots with their leader. They have all struggled in this glorious cause. Shall we direct our sympathies to the leader? Shall we, freemen, recognizing the principle of equality—adhering with devotion to freedom, whether it burn in the bosom of a President, a Governor, or an humble citizen—shall we say to these people you—the mass—are beyond the reach of our sympathy? We have invited you here, to be sure; and, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, we shall give you a hundred and sixty acres of land; but you are not the objects of our cordial sympathy; you are not the persons to whom we will extend the cordial welcome which this resolution proposes. The only individual among you is Louis Kossuth—to whom the open hand of welcome shall be extended, but not to you. If this were a question of first impression—if we had not committed ourselves by our previous action, I ask Senators whether they would be willing to make this discrimination between the private and the officer—open your heart to the leader, but turn the back of your hand to his associates by whom he was sustained, and without whose exertions and exposures to peril, from which he, perhaps, might have been safe, his efforts would have been utterly unavailing? Is this a principle of your action? Would this be a rule of the Senator from Michigan, if it were a question of first impressions—if we were not already committed by our previous action?

When we turn to the act of the Congress of the United States in relation to these Hungarian patriots, the idea which I was desirous of presenting to the Senate receives a thousandfold additional force. The honorable Senator from Michigan will not engage in any philological analysis of the original resolution. He will not engage in critical commentary upon its words. Who has asked it? Who has called upon the Senator to go into an analysis, or commentary, upon the words of the original resolution? The plain, the obvious interpretation of these words, points out to us what we have done before, and is an index to us of what we ought to do now, so far as it is proper for us to act at all. I would call the attention of the honorable Senator to that resolution. He will not agree to any analysis or commentary upon it; and why? To substitute his estimation of what has been done, for the record of what has been done. He says we have invited Governor Kossuth here, under circumstances which he has glowingly depicted, as the great leader of a noble struggle for freedom. He says we have invited him here in that capacity. I deny the fact; and I appeal to the record—to no philological analysis—to no critical commentary upon it, but to the plain recorded language of the American Congress:

A Resolution for the relief of Louis Kossuth and his Associates, exiles from Hungary.

Whereas the people of the United States sincerely sympathize with the Hungarian exiles, Kossuth and his associates, and fully appreciate the magnanimous conduct of the Turkish Government in receiving and treating these noble exiles with kindness and hospitality; and if it be the wish of these exiles to emigrate to the United States, and the will of the Sultan to permit them to leave his dominions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is requested to authorize the employment of some one of the public vessels which may now be cruising in the Mediterranean to receive and convey to the United States the said Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity.

I said that if this was a case of first impression, our sympathy was equally due to the associates of Mr. Kossuth as to himself. I say we are not at all at liberty to moot the question; that we have committed ourselves by the expression of our sympathies for his associates as well as for himself; that we have invited them to our country if they desired to emigrate; and that we have imposed upon ourselves, therefore, an obligation to fulfill any reasonable expectation which that invitation was calculated to excite.

The honorable Senator says that it is quite customary for Governments to contribute to the support of exiles, whether monarchs or of lower rank. I doubt not the power of this Government—I have no doubt that we would violate no principle of the law of nations in extending to these Hungarian patriots such assistance as would be necessary to make the asylum which we have offered to them a comfortable one. I have no such doubt. But the question which I here present to you is, Will you confine your sympathy—will you confine your benevolence—will you confine the manifestations of your devotion to the cause of civil liberty throughout the world, to the person of Louis Kossuth alone, and turn the back of your hand upon those whom you have invited with him, and whom you authorized to expect would have a comfortable asylum accorded to them? That is the question. It is upon this branch of the amendment that Senators are now to record their votes, and that the country will find whether they mean to make this distinction in favor of the leader, and against his followers who assisted him to achieve that fame which is the subject of admiration.

Mr. CASS. I desire merely to answer the question put to me so emphatically by the honorable Senator from Georgia, whether I am in favor of making these distinctions, or not? I reply, that I am decidedly in favor of making these distinctions. Mr. President, you know, and every Senator knows, that it is an old way to defeat a measure by tacking tail after tail to it. I do not mean to say that the honorable Senator from Georgia has any such object in view, but I believe he would vote for the resolution if amended to suit him. I reminded the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] the other day, of an amendment which he proposed to a resolution of mine two years ago. I then proposed to suspend diplomatic intercourse with Austria. He proposed to tack on Russia. And if that had carried, I suppose some one else would have moved to attach China, and so on; and we might have traveled round the whole circumference of the globe before we got a vote upon the original resolution. Every one, therefore, understands it.

Here is a plain and distinct proposition. I confess, for one, I was in favor of the original resolution. I want to do honor to the great principle of human freedom in the person of Kossuth. Circumstances have given him a high and lofty position before the world; the eyes of civilization are upon him, and I desire emphatically to declare the opinion of the American people with reference to the principles he advocates. That is the reason I do not wish to mingle anything else with this resolution. I tell the Senator from Georgia, that I am perfectly willing to welcome the Italian exiles, the Irish exiles, or any other exiles who have come here from the oppressions of despotism; and if he will introduce resolutions for these purposes, I will vote for every one of them. But I will not tack them on to this proposition, so as to injure or defeat it. I will vote for every resolution he can bring forward welcoming a political exile from a land of oppression to a land of freedom. All I object to is the place. I do not want to have this resolution defeated or lessened in its value by the addition of anything else. Although I honor Kossuth much, I honor liberty more. It is because the eyes of the world have been upon him, and Providence seems to have placed him as the great leader, at the head of his countrymen; and therefore, in some measure, he has become the incarnation of a principle, and I am willing to do honor to the man, and honor to the principle with which he is connected.

Mr. BERRIEN. The honorable Senator from Michigan does not impute to me the intention.

Mr. CASS. I said that I believed the Senator would vote for the proposition; but I spoke of the general effect of tacking these things to resolutions that were introduced. I know the honorable Senator—and I stated that I knew he would vote for his proposition. But we have seen instances in this Senate where men have brought forward propositions which they did not mean to vote for. Therefore I am always cautious.

Mr. BERRIEN. I am perfectly satisfied that the Senate, as well as the Senator from Michigan, will render it entirely unnecessary for me to disclaim any intention to do what he says is frequently done. But is this a tacking to an original proposition of an amendment which is calculated to defeat it? Did not the mover of this resolution begin by detaching from the original resolution of the Senate the associates of Governor Kossuth? That resolution embraced Governor Kossuth and his associates. In the spirit of that resolution they have been brought to our shores. Why do you not embrace them all in this welcome? So far have I been from attaching any extraneous subject to that which was the original spirit of the movement, that it is the mover of this resolution who has detached Governor Kossuth from his associates who were united with him in the original resolution. The original resolution embraced them both, and I desired merely to restore the ancient status—to carry out the original proposition of the Congress, and to correct the detachment of these Hungarian patriots from their leader.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech. My views of this resolution are well known. I shall vote for it in almost any shape in which it can be presented. My object is simply to divest the subject, if possible, with some suggestions of my own, from some extraneous considerations which have been thrown around it. Senators are looking to the consequences to result from the action of foreign nations, growing out of this. Gentlemen have been so fond of reading the foreign history of the world, that they have neglected domestic history. If gentleman had read carefully the history of this country, they would have seen that there is a precedent for every step that may, by any contingency, arise. Suppose we pass this resolution, and suppose some offence is taken at it: what have we to do? Simply introduce a joint resolution, and reannex Hungary to this country. [Laughter.] Reannexation is the remedy which is to be applied. Suppose Austria squirm at that: then all that is to be done is, for us to declare that war exists by the act of Austria. [Laughter.] Then we can, according to precedent, take two thirds of Austria. I wish to commend this view of the subject to gentlemen whose minds are oppressed by fear of the consequences that will grow out of the action of foreign nations. I appeal to the conservative portion of the Senate—without any offence—that here is a precedent clear and well established: a precedent which has led to glorious results heretofore; and we shall not only, in this way, welcome one hero to our shores, but we shall raise up another brood of our own. [Laughter.] I am sorry to see Senators treat so serious a matter so lightly. It seems to me to be unbecoming the subject.

I hope that this resolution will pass. A word more in regard to the admonition which has been so kindly, and, I have no doubt, so considerably bestowed by the honorable Senator from Michigan. I have refrained from offering any amendment to this resolution. I had another victim of oppression in my mind's eye, and I have a good many of all colors. I had a white victim in my heart, and wanted to have a little sympathy for him. But, instead of being subject to censure, by offering an amendment for that purpose, I have reserved it for an original resolution. And I propose to have the sympathies of the Senate expressed, at some future day, in favor of Abd el Kader; and, therefore, I have refrained, and will refrain, from offering any amendment.

A SENATOR. Is he white?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that he is as white as some men that pass for white men. In accordance with what I have said, I shall vote against all of these amendments, because, when I want to extend the right hand of friendship to Kossuth, I want him to understand that it is a good, honest grip. I don't want to say, when I meet a friend from the Southern States—I shake hands with you, but I want you to understand that I do not agree to all your notions, and I do not want to favor your peculiar institutions—but I want to give him an honest shake, if he will take it; and if he takes one from me, I do not expect him to indorse all my fanaticism by the act. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I simply rise to say, that if gentlemen desire to vote on such a resolution as that described by the honorable Senator from Georgia, they will probably have an opportunity. Sir, I understand that such a resolution will probably be offered by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] after awhile, as a separate proposition. I hope there will be no difficulty then. I am glad to see gentlemen's sympathy enlarging so rapidly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I shall not long detain the Senate.

I regret that this resolution has been introduced, not because I do not cordially unite with all my sympathies, in the proposed measures for the reception of Governor Kossuth, but for the reason that it could not pass this body unanimously. A resolution to give such a reception as has been proposed should pass with entire unanimity; for its discussion and a divided vote deprive it of its chief merit. I would not have brought forward the resolution for the simple reason, that I have yet to learn that the man lives, or ever did live, that could make a proposition in this body that would not give rise to discussion. It has been objected to this resolution, sir, that its passage would give offence to the principal Powers of Europe. I have heard this objection raised in relation to so many matters of legislation that I have become heartily tired of it. I do not deem it material whether the reception of Governor Kossuth will give offence to the crowned heads of Europe, provided it does not violate the laws of nations, and give just cause of offence. The question with me is, not whether it will be agreeable to the despotic Powers of Europe; for I well know that they will not be pleased with any action of this Republic which gives encouragement to European movements favorable to liberal institutions; the question, therefore, is not whether they will be pleased or displeased, but whether the adoption of such a resolution gives just cause of offence, according to the laws of nations. Sir, I know of no principle of the law of nations that deprives a Republic of the right of expressing its cordial sympathy in all movements tending to the establishment of free principles throughout the world. I hold that it is our duty to demonstrate our heartfelt sympathy and profound admiration, by every act which is appropriate to the occasion and to the subject-matter. It is due to our own character, in vindication of the history of our revolutionary struggles, which resulted in the establishment of republican institutions upon this continent.

But while it is our duty to do this much, I would take no step which would violate any principle of the law of nations, or give just cause of offence to any Power on earth. Nor do I think that a cordial welcome to Governor Kossuth, accompanied by the expression of our devotion to the cause with which his life is identified, and our sincere desire for his entire success, can be properly construed into such cause of offence. The distinguished Senator from Michigan has well remarked that it has been the usual practice of all enlightened nations in Europe to give a welcome and an asylum to all exiles who have been unsuccessful in their struggle for liberty in their native land. He has referred to the example of England, and might also have cited that of France during the period that he represented this nation with so much honor and dignity at the Court of Louis Philippe. If my recollection serves me right, Louis Philippe, for many years, in his annual speech from the throne, expressed his heartfelt desire and strongest hopes for the restoration of the nationality of Poland, which had been divided and apportioned among the Powers composing the Holy Alliance of despotism. He did not stop there, for, under the direction of his Minister of Finance, between one and two millions of francs were appropriated each year for the support of the several thousand exiles then in his own capital, waiting an opportunity, like Kossuth and his associates, to return and engage in the struggle for the independence and freedom of their native land.

If, then, a King, in the heart of Europe, could from his throne express such a desire in behalf of unfortunate Poland, and at the same time could tax his people to raise millions of money for the support of the patriotic exiles, without giving cause of offence to his brother Kings, shall it be said that Democratic America is not to be permitted to grant a hearty welcome to an exile who has become the representative of liberal principles throughout the world, lest despotic Austria and Russia shall be offended? We should not close our eyes to the fact, that a great movement is in progress, which threatens the existence of every absolute government in Europe. It will be a struggle between liberal and absolute principles—between Republicanism and Despotism. Are we to remain cold and indifferent spectators when the time of action shall arrive, and the exciting scene shall be presented to our view? Will it not become our duty to do whatever the interests, honor, and glory of our own country may require, in pursuance of the laws of nations, to give encouragement to that great movement? Should we not recognize the independence of each Republic as soon as it shall be established; open diplomatic intercourse, and form commercial treaties; and, in short, extend the right hand of fellowship, tendering all the courtesies and privileges which should exist between friendly nations of the same political faith? I think that the bearing of this country should be such as to demonstrate to all mankind that America sympathizes with the popular movement against despotism, whenever and wherever made. I hold that the principle laid down by Governor Kossuth as the basis of his action—that each State has a right to dispose of her own destiny, and regulate her internal affairs in her own way, without the interference of any foreign Power—is an axiom in the laws of nations which every State ought to recognize and respect. I am prepared now to assert and affirm the proposition by a vote of the Senate, as a part of the international code. It is equally clear to my mind, that any violation of this principle by one nation, intervening for the purpose of destroying the liberties of another, is such an infraction of the international code as would authorize any State to interpose which should conceive that it had sufficient interest in the question to become the vindicator of the laws of nations. The armed intervention of Russia to deprive Hungary of her constitutional rights, was such a violation of the laws of nations as authorized England or the United States to interfere and prevent the consummation of the deed, if either had chosen to do so. If another alliance shall be formed by the despots of Europe to destroy the last vestige of freedom that now remains, the question will then arise, what course interest, duty, and honor, require us to pursue? We will have the right, under the law of nations, to interfere or not, according to our convictions of duty, when the case shall be presented. I will not say, as most Senators have said, that in no event will I be for interference by this Government. I will judge of the case when it arises. To say in advance that the United States will not interfere in vindication of the laws of nations, is to give our consent that Russia may interfere, in violation of the international code, to destroy the liberties of an independent nation. Such a declaration would afford as much encouragement to Russia and Austria in the consummation of their work of blood and vengeance, as a similar declaration by our Government on a recent occasion did in instigating Spain to butcher American citizens without the form of trial, and in violation of treaty stipulations. I will make no such declaration. I will grant no such license to the absolute governments of Europe. On the other hand, I will not advise the declaration in advance that we will interfere. Such a declaration might be looked upon as a blustering, empty threat. I would make no declaration upon the subject either way until the proper occasion shall arise. I would have this Republic retain within herself the control over her own action, so that we may be in condition to do whatever our interests and duty may require when the time for action comes. I think this is the most dignified and imposing position our country can occupy. It gives us the control of our own movements, and enables us to perform our duties to ourselves and to the rest of the world according to our convictions from day to day and year to year, as the occasion shall present itself.

Sir, something has been said about an alliance with England, to restrain the march of Russia over the European Continent. I am free to say that I desire no alliance with England, or with any other crowned head. I am not willing to acknowledge that America needs England as an ally to maintain the principles of our Government. Nor am I willing to go to the rescue of England to save her from the power of the Autocrat, until she assimilates her institutions to ours. Hers is a half-way house between despotism and republicanism. She is responsible, as much as any power in Europe, for the failure of the revolutionary movements which have occurred within the last four years. English diplomacy, English intrigue, and English perfidy put down the revolution in Sicily and in Italy, and was the greatest barrier to its success even in Hungary. So long as England shall, by her diplomacy, attempt to defeat liberal movements in Europe, I am utterly averse to an alliance with her to sustain her monarch, her nobles, and her privileged classes. She must sustain her constitutional monarchy, even against absolutism, without receiving aid from republican America with my consent, and especially so long as she condemns to imprisonment and transportation for life the noble Irish patriots, whose only crime consisted in attempting that for which the great Hungarian is now idolized by the English people. She must do justice to Ireland, and the Irish patriots in exile, and to the masses of her own people, by relieving them from the oppressive taxation imposed to sustain the privileged classes, and by adopting republican institutions, before she can have my sympathy, much less my aid, even against Russia. I wish no alliance with monarchs. No republican movement will ever succeed so long as the people put their trust in princes. The fatal error committed in Italy, in Germany, in France, wherever the experiment was tried, consisted in placing a prince at the head of the popular movement. The princes all sympathized with the dynasties from which they were descended, and seized the first opportunity to produce a reaction, and to betray the people into the hands of their oppressors. There is reason to believe that much of this was accomplished through British diplomacy and intrigue. What more natural? The power of the British Government is in the hands of the princes and the nobility. Their sympathies are all with the privileged classes of other countries, in every movement which does not affect the immediate interests of their own kingdom. Republicanism has nothing to hope, therefore, from England so long as she maintains her existing government, and preserves her present policy. I repeat, I desire no alliance with England. We require no assistance from her, and will yield none to her until she does justice to her own people. The peculiar position of our country requires that we should have an American policy in our foreign relations, based upon the principles of our own Government, and adapted to the spirit of the age. We should sympathize with every liberal movement—recognize the independence of all Republics—form commercial treaties, and open diplomatic relations with them—protest against all infractions of the laws of nations, and hold ourselves ready to do whatever our duty may require when a case shall arise.

Returning to the immediate question before the Senate, I hold that a welcome to Governor Kossuth—a national welcome and a public reception by both Houses of Congress—is no cause of offence to any Power on earth. That the despotic Powers of the Old World would prefer to have us withhold from this distinguished champion of freedom every act of courtesy and evidence of sympathy, is doubtless true; for they would take his life, and consign his name to infamy, for the very deeds which endear him to every American heart, and make him the representative of the liberal movement in the Old World. We love and honor him for the same reason that they hate and fear him. Hence we cannot regulate our action by their wishes. We should not act in abject obedience to the wishes of other nations, whose institutions are different from ours, nor in fear of their resentment. We should act in fear of God, performing our duty to ourselves and to mankind, and leave the world to form its own opinion. I desire to extend this welcome to Governor Kossuth, because he is the recognized representative of the popular movement in Europe. The resolution does not commit us to anything in the future. It is no sufficient objection that Governor Kossuth may ask more for his country than we deem it consistent with the interests and honor of our country to grant. I repeat, we will judge of that question when it arises. I will not encourage the despots of Europe by our refusal in advance, nor will I mislead him by inducing hopes which may not be realized. Let us do our duty now, and reserve the right to do whatever American interests and honor and duty may require in the future.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, when the first resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Foote] was presented, I briefly stated the reasons why I could not vote for that resolution. Since the discussion has commenced, the character of the proposition before the body has most essentially changed. It is due to candor, and to a right understanding of this subject, before the nation and the distinguished individual whom we are disposed to honor, that we should understand each other thoroughly; that we should know what were the expectations created in the mind of Kossuth when he received what is called the invitation to the hospitalities of this country. We have to ask him his impression of that invitation. We should know what expectations were created. We should understand them. We should understand his impressions of the obligation he is laid under. And then candor would compel us to investigate the understanding between the host and the guest. We tendered to him a national vessel to come to this country and seek an asylum; or to come and receive hospitality, according to the interpretation of some. We did not intend to interfere with the domestic affairs of Hungary, or any other country. We found him an exile, a voluntary captive, or under the hospitable protection of the Turkish Government. We asked him here. He has come. On his way to receive our hospitality, he announces to the world the character of the invitation. He lets us understand what is his construction of it: that he has come here, not merely for the purpose of receiving our sympathy, but to ask of us to interfere between his country and foreign Governments. He asks us to declare that we will interfere, in the event that the struggle should recommence in Hungary against Austria. He tells the world that this is the object of his visit. And, when he lands on our shores, he tells us that he knew he had our sympathies; that he and his countrymen had the sympathies of the world; that it was not for mere sympathy that he crossed the Atlantic ocean; that he came here to have something more substantial. He wants to receive the pledge of this Government, that if the hour of revolution should ever come again in his fatherland, the United States will stand by and see fair play; and that if any other nation on earth interferes, then the United States shall take part in the controversy. That is the character of the position he now occupies. He tells us that he expects the material of aid to protect his country. And what is that? Men, money, and arms. That is his impression.

Is it not, then, due to candor—do not honor and magnanimity require us to announce to Kossuth that this Government has no such design? Will you suffer him to come to the seat of Government with such expectations? or will you state to him the character in which you expect to receive him? My colleague, sensible of his position, and of the impression made upon the mind of this distinguished individual by this formal welcome to our shores, has introduced an amendment asking us to announce to him that he is mistaken; that he is not to come to the seat of Government of this great nation under the expectation that this Government gives any pledge, or any assurance, that they will sustain him at any time. Why should we not tell him that he must not expect that we shall afford him men and means as a Government? As an honorable man, connected with another individual, would you suffer that individual to have wrong impressions in relation to the course you intended to pursue? Would you not let him understand precisely what you intended? Just so with nations. It is due from the Government of the United States to announce to this distinguished individual the object they have in view. I submit to honorable Senators whether they intend to justify the expectations which Kossuth has announced he had in coming to this country? Will they allow the impression to be left on his mind that we are to furnish him with any material of war? I think not, although some Senators declare that they will not express an opinion one way or the other; that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" when the occasion arises, they will determine whether or not to interfere. This is the language of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas.] This is the language of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass;] and indirectly, the language of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Foote.]

When the Senator from Mississippi read the speech made by the present distinguished Secretary of State in 1823, it at once drew my attention to the State of this country at that time, and to the principles upon which the Republican party have stood from the days of Washington down to the present hour. Then it was that revolutions were going on in South America; then it was that our country had to announce to the civilized world the principles upon which we administered this happy Government. Then it was, I would remind the Senator, that the distinguished Mr. Monroe, who concentrated in himself, on account of his purity, both the Republican and Federal parties, announced what were the principles of this Government, and the principles which had been sustained by Washington, by Adams, by Jefferson, and by Madison. I will show you, by reference to the message of 1824, what were the views of Mr. Monroe, and upon precisely such a question as this; that is, the question of interference with foreign Governments. I beg to read from that message, in order that this may go out with the speech which was read by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I wish to ask the gentleman whether we are to understand him as concurring with Mr. Webster, or Mr. Monroe?

Mr. DAWSON. If they differ at all, I concur with Mr. Monroe, though I do not think there is any difference of opinion. But I would ask the Senator, in return, whether in 1824 he would have concurred with Mr. Webster, or Mr. Monroe?

Mr. FOOTE. If their views were the same there is no necessity for that.

Mr. DAWSON. I read from Mr. Monroe's message of 1824:

"In turning our attention to the condition of the civilized world, in which the United States have always taken a deep interest, it is gratifying to see how large a portion of it is blessed with peace. The only wars which now exist within that limit, are those between Turkey and Greece, in Europe, and between Spain and the new Governments, our neighbors, in this hemisphere. In both these wars, the cause of independence, of liberty, and humanity, continues to prevail. The success of Greece, when the relative population of the contending parties is considered, commands our admiration and applause, and that it has had a similar effect with the neighboring powers, is obvious. The feeling of the whole civilized world is excited, in a high degree, in their favor. May we not hope that these sentiments, winning on the hearts of their respective Governments, may lead to a more decisive result? that they may produce an accord among them, to replace Greece on the ground which she formerly held, and to which her heroic exertions, at this day, so eminently entitle her.

"With respect to the contest, to which our neighbors are a party, it is evident that Spain, as a power, is scarcely felt in it. These new States had completely achieved their independence before it was acknowledged by the United States, and they have since maintained it with little foreign pressure. The disturbances which have appeared in certain portions of that vast territory, have proceeded from internal causes, which had their origin in their former governments, and have not yet been thoroughly removed. It is manifest that these causes are daily losing their effect, and that these new States are settling down under governments elective and representative in every branch similar to our own. In this course we ardently wish them to persevere, under a firm conviction that it will promote their happiness. In this their career, however, we have not interfered, believing that every people have a right to institute for themselves the government which, in their judgment, may suit them best. Our example is before them, of the good effect of which, being our neighbors, they are competent judges, and to their judgment we leave it, in the expectation that other powers will pursue the same policy. The deep interest which we take in their independence, which we have acknowledged, and in their enjoyment of all the rights incident thereto, especially in the very important one of instituting their own governments, has been declared, and is known to the world. Separated, as we are, from Europe, by the great Atlantic ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments, nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into which ever scale it may turn, in its various vibrations, cannot affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all. But in regard to our neighbors, our situation is different. It is impossible for the European Governments to interfere in their concerns, especially in those alluded to, which are vital, without affecting us; indeed, the motive which might induce such interference in the present state of the war between the parties, if a war it may be called, would appear to be equally applicable to us. It is gratifying to know that some of the powers with whom we enjoy a very friendly intercourse, and to whom these views have been communicated, have appeared to acquiesce in them."

Sir, the principles here laid down by Mr. Monroe have been laid down from the foundation of this Government: that we should not interfere in the affairs of European nations; that we should take no part in their wars; and that we should suffer no European Power to interfere or intermeddle with the internal relations of this continent. What is sought now to be done? I know that gentlemen disclaim the idea of interference; that is, they do not intend to intermeddle in any of their strifes. But what is the proposition before us, stripped of the circumstances which surround it? Take away the verbiage and the rhetoric which have been thrown around it, and what does the proposition amount to? What does Kossuth expect from this country? What does he believe your invitation is intended to signify? From whom can you get this information but himself? He tells you, candidly, that he comes, not merely for your sympathy, but for your material—for your pronouncement or proclamation, that in case Austria and Hungary again engage in bloody strife, you will stand by and see fair play; and if any other foreign Power interferes, we shall take a hand in it. I defy any Senator to put a different construction upon the language of this distinguished man. Yet, in a crisis like this, in our own country, at a time just preceding the presidential election, when the foreign influence is tremendous, we are called upon to do this. I say it is wrong. There is a want of candor and a want of magnanimity in giving him a public reception here, unless we tell him what we really intend to do, and what we intended at the time we invited him, and that when we opened our hearts to receive him, it was for the purpose of throwing around him the protection of the Constitution and laws of this country. But when he comes here, he changes his character to that of an agitator, and proclaims to us—Gentlemen, I will dine with you; but I shall prescribe the character of the dishes which shall be on your table; I shall tell you what I expect when I come to see you, and not leave it to your own taste. This question comes home to our candor and magnanimity, not as politicians, but as men and statesmen. The consequences growing out of this question will involve not us only, but our reputation as a Senate. Is there a Senator here who would say to Kossuth, We will give you the material of war at the proper time? But, he says, I come here under that expectation; I announced that expectation, and still you asked me to come. He will say to you, as he said to the deputation from Philadelphia, that "if he had known, before he came here, that this was the limitation put upon the invitation, he would have hesitated long before he would have come."

Kossuth is acting with candor. He is carrying out that boldness and independence of conduct which has marked his career. Let us follow the same example, and when dealing with a man of honor, of chivalry, of intelligence and statesmanship, let us deal with him in candor, and not allow him to be lead astray by our uncertain course. Hence it is that I have taken up my position in opposition to this resolution; hence, I oppose the resolution of the Senator from New York. What is meant by it? The Senator from Michigan says, we welcome Kossuth as the representative of a great principle. Of what principle? Kossuth says it is the right of nations to interfere with foreign nations; not the principle of non-intervention, but the right to interfere when two contending Powers are engaged in war to prevent a third Power from taking part. That is his principle, and he expects it to be sustained. Now, will you receive him, and receive him publicly, without announcing to him what we mean—without letting him understand, as proposed by my colleague, the principle which we intend to pursue—a principle coeval with the foundation of our Union?

I ask pardon of the Senate for having trespassed so long upon them. I did not design to speak, but I thought it necessary for me to do so in consequence of the position in which the question had been placed.

Mr. BADGER. I have some remarks which I should be extremely glad to submit to the Senate on this subject. As they are not intended for Buncombe but for the Senate, I should be extremely glad to have an opportunity of submitting them at an hour of the day when the Senate is full. In addition to that, I am laboring under a cold which unfits me for addressing the Senate this evening, and I should be extremely glad to have this subject postponed until to-morrow. I move that it be so postponed.

Mr. SEWARD. Does the Senator wish to speak upon the amendment or upon the original resolution?

Mr. BADGER. I desire to speak upon the resolution, and upon the amendment as connected with the resolution.

Mr. DAWSON. I understand that a Senator from Alabama and a Senator from Texas, who are not now in their seats, also desire to speak upon the question.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to postpone until to-morrow the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. CASS. I would yield as cheerfully to the Senator from North Carolina as any other gentleman; but it seems to me that this, instead of being merely courteous, would prolong debate. I would like to have this proposition voted on, for I understand that if it is voted down another will be offered. I hope the subject will be disposed of.

Mr. BADGER. I am extremely obliged to the honorable Senator from Michigan for that courtesy which manifests itself in words and not in acts; which shows itself with an almost spontaneous granting when there is no desire to refuse, and refuses at the very moment it is courteous to grant. I throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate. I do not often ask these things.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. BADGER. I now desire, not for my accommodation, but at the suggestion of some of my friends on both sides of the Chamber, to renew the motion made this morning by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I hope my friend will not press that motion. As I shall leave here in about ten days, I feel a particular anxiety in relation to one particular subject. I am exceedingly anxious to know the position of my resolution in relation to the compromise measures.

The PRESIDENT. That resolution is the next special order, and it will come up after this is disposed of.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his motion, and that we shall meet to-morrow, with the understanding that this resolution shall be the subject of discussion.

Mr. BADGER. Does the Senator wish to push forward anything for California now?

Mr. GWIN. I want to have this resolution out of the way.

Mr. BADGER. As the ultimate object of my friend from California is to expedite the California business, I would say to him that festina lente is the best policy about that. This pushing forward of California will ultimately put her further behind. We have a long session before us. We are all extremely anxious at the earliest convenient moment to do everything that is necessary for California, but do not press us into sitting on Fridays before the Christmas holidays.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I am utterly opposed to losing time in this way. It does seem to me rather censurable, and I think it will be censured by this country, if we adjourn until Monday without disposing of the Kossuth resolution. Unless it is disposed of before Monday, I feel that its adoption will do no good. As suggested by my friend from California, we might meet to-morrow with an understanding that the Kossuth resolution would be disposed of, after we should have the enjoyment of listening to the Senator from North Carolina. I think that we have already extended the spirit of accommodation far enough by postponing the resolution until to-morrow. I cannot consent to adjourn until Monday.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate refuses to adjourn until Monday, they will be departing from the usual and ordinary course—from the super antiquas vias. If we meet to-morrow, instead of lessening it will open the floodgates of debate, in my opinion, and inflict ten speeches for one we should otherwise have had. It will be considered a sort of invitation for gentlemen to come and speak. I know the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE] has but a few days to stay and a great deal to say. Hence his anxiety that we should sit to-morrow.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Having said a good deal, I have very little more to say. I shall, during my continuance in this body this session, say nothing more unless something which I have already said shall be assailed.

Mr. HALE. If I did not know what the Senator meant by "a single word," I might be governed by his suggestion; but I do know. I hope the Senate will adjourn over.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senate will indulge me while I make a single suggestion as regards this proposition to adjourn until Monday. We have excited an intense interest in the bosom of an illustrious man who is now upon our shores, and whose course, we know, may be affected by the decision at which we shall arrive. I hope that, out of consideration for him whom we have brought here, we will not adjourn over until Monday and leave him in suspense until next week.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Berrien, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Pratt, Spruance, and Underwood—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Borland, Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mahony, Norris, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—27.

So the motion was not agreed to. On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The following gentlemen were announced to constitute the select committee authorized to be appointed yesterday upon the petition of W. T. G. Morton, praying remuneration as the discoverer of etherization, viz: Messrs. BISSELL, FITCH, STANLEY, RANTOUL, and SUTHERLAND.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. DISNEY, on leave, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to remit the tolls on the United States stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and to purchase the shares of the individual stockholders, and to make the navigation of the said canal free, and to construct a free canal on the Indiana side of the Falls of the Ohio; which, having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. D. moved that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. VENABLE moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It contained some important principles, and should be fully discussed.

Mr. KING, of New York. Let it be first referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and we can have the report of that committee to guide us.

Mr. VENABLE withdrew his motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table—the only place, he said, where it ought to be. He demanded the yeas and nays upon the question; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Roads and Canals, it was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. DISNEY asked to be excused from service on the Committee of Elections, for reasons which, he said, he deemed satisfactory to himself; not, however, for want of respect in the appointing power.

The question was put, and he was excused.

GRANT OF LAND.

Mr. PHELPS, on leave, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Louis to the western line of said State; which having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. PHELPS moved that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, remarked that it was not customary to print a bill until it was reported back from the committee. The committee might think proper to report an entirely different bill.

Mr. PHELPS withdrew the motion to print. The bill was then referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. HOUSTON said that he felt himself called upon to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the view to take up and refer the President's annual message. He submitted that motion.

The question was put and agreed to; and The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES of Tennessee in the chair,) and took up for consideration the President's message.

Mr. HOUSTON submitted a series of resolutions; which were read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session, as relates to our foreign affairs, together with the accompanying correspondence in relation thereto—the proposed increase of compensation to the Commissioner to China—marking the boundary line between Oregon and the British possessions; so much as relates to the reception of Governor Kosuth and his companions—the amendment of the law for the protection or punishment of Consuls—be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.
 2. That so much of said message as relates to the existing tariff, and recommends a revision and change thereof; so much as relates to the general condition of the finances—the revenue and the prevention of frauds in its collection—the Treasury—the public debt and its payment—the estimated receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year, together with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and estimates accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.
 3. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the condition and operations of the Army of the United States; so much as recommends an increase of the same, together with the report of the Secretary of War, and the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.
 4. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Navy of the United States—its condition and operations; so much as recommends the establishment of a navy-yard on the Pacific, together with the report of the Secretary of the Navy, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.
 5. That so much of said message as relates to the appointment of a commission to revise the public statutes of the United States—as recommends a change in the law relative to fees to certain officers; so much as recommends the appointment of a commission to settle all private claims against the United States; so much as recommends the enactment of a law making it penal to forge, &c., bounty land warrants, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.
 6. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to our intercourse with the Indian tribes, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.
 7. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the Post Office Department, the transportation of the mail, the revision of the law regulating postages on printed matter, together with the report of the Postmaster General, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.
 8. That so much of said message as relates to commerce, the improvement of harbors, reciprocal trade between the United States and Canada, and other British possessions near our frontier, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.
 9. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to the public lands; so much as recommends an increase of compensation to commissioners to settle private land claims in California, and the establishment of land offices, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.
 10. That so much of said message as relates to the improvement of the navigation of rivers, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.
 11. That so much of said message as relates to the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.
 12. That so much of said message as relates to the District of Columbia, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.
 13. That so much of said message and accompanying documents as relates to a revision and amendment of the laws relating to pensions, be referred to the Committee on invalid Pensions.
 14. That so much of said message as relates to the public buildings be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.
- Mr. HALL said: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to discuss the President's message. By the indulgence of the committee, I design to say a few words with reference to a bill I introduced into the House on yesterday. That bill proposes to grant to the State of Missouri the right of way and a portion of the public domain to aid in the construction of a railroad from Hannibal to St. Joseph. Some gentlemen seem startled at the project. I assure them it is nothing new nor unheard-of in the history of our country. It is only about fifteen months since Congress made an extensive grant of land to the State of Illinois, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Chicago to Mobile bay. I am not aware that that grant has ruined or seriously injured either this Government, or any State, or any individual. On the contrary, I believe it has been of general benefit. At all events, the road it was intended to promote will be one of vast importance, and is destined to exert a most happy influence on the country at large. It is not, however, to be concealed that the Chicago and Mobile road must run nearly parallel with the greatest river on our continent, and must enter into competition with most of the great thoroughfares of the West. All the rivers of our great valley tend from the North to the South. The Ohio and its tributaries on the one hand, and the Missouri, the Arkansas, and the Red river and their tributaries on the other, in conjunction with the Mississippi, open up the entire West to New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico. But between the Atlantic seaboard and the New States there is no direct natural channel of intercommunication. Commerce can be carried on successfully between the old States and the Mississippi valley only by doubling Cape Sable or through means of artificial avenues extending from the Atlantic coast far into the interior. Hence if the last Congress was justifiable in aiding the construction of a railroad from the northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, we shall be more than justified in aiding the construction of a highway from the extreme confines of Missouri to the States this side of the Alleghenies—a highway which will open a direct, speedy, safe, and economical communication between parts of the Union that now hold intercourse only by the most circuitous, tardy, hazardous, and expensive routes. The Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad will form an important part of such a line of intercommunication.

The town of Hannibal is situated on the west bank of the Mississippi river, in latitude 39° 45' north. The town of Saint Joseph is one hundred and eighty miles due west of Hannibal, on the east bank of the Missouri river. The city of Philadelphia, and the seats of government of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, are nearly on the same parallel of latitude with the town of Hannibal. So that a railroad running due west from Philadelphia would pass through the centre of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, cross the Mississippi at Hannibal, and strike the Missouri at Saint Joseph. Within eighteen months a railroad will be completed from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh. Within the same time a railroad will be finished from Pittsburgh to Columbus, Ohio. A railroad is nearly finished between Terre Haute, near the western line of Indiana, to Indianapolis, in that State. The Illinois cross-cut railroad is already finished from Springfield to the Illinois river, and in less than two years will be finished to the town of Quincy, which is only twelve miles from Hannibal; so that in the course of a few years we may reasonably expect to see a railroad communication complete between Philadelphia and the Mississippi river. The construction of the Hannibal and Saint Joseph railroad will complete the connection as far west as the Missouri. The same chain of railroads, too, which will connect the western portions of the State of Missouri with Philadelphia, will unite with that great railway line already extending from New York city to Cincinnati, and also with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and with the road from Louisville, by way of Nashville, to Savannah, Georgia, and to Charleston, South Carolina. Thus, in a few years, may we hope to see the banks of the Missouri river, and the fertile country bordering thereon, brought within three days' travel of the metropolis of the Union, and of the great cities of Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Nor is this all. The railroad from Chicago to the mouth of the Ohio river is to be completed within a few years. The Hannibal and Saint Joseph railroad will connect with the Chicago and Cairo road, by means of the Springfield, Illinois, railroad. In this way will be opened to the South and to the northern lakes, as well as to the Atlantic seaboard, all the fertile country included within northern Missouri, and all that immense country to the west of our State, which is destined in a few years to be the home of multitudes of white men. Let any one, sir, turn to the map of the United States, and endeavor to trace out the line of railroads which will most promote the welfare of the whole country, and he will inevitably fall upon that very line of which the Hannibal and Saint Joseph railroad makes a part. That road is on the parallel of latitude which passes midway between the northern boundary of the United States and the mouth of the Mississippi river. It is on the line which passes through the heart of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. It is on the line which passes between the northern lakes and the Ohio river, at nearly an equal distance from each. It is on the line which divides the population of the United States into two equal parts. It is on the line which connects at the same time with the great New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and southern railroads, and by means of which, therefore, more distant and more numerous points of the Union can be brought into easy communication than any other which can be conceived.

The opening of good roads between the eastern and western portions of the Union has been a favorite object with our greatest statesmen almost from the foundation of our Government. The Cumberland turnpike was projected by one of the "early Presidents," and has been carried forward at the expense of millions of dollars. In consequence of modern improvements, that work has become nearly useless. But the time has been when the Cumberland road, by its promise of opening a way from the old to the new States, was a much-cherished object with a large portion of the American people. It is now proposed to effect the same purpose by the greatest of modern improvements without the cost of a dollar to the Government—without the exercise of any dangerous or doubtful power, by the mere appropriation of a small portion of the public domain in a manner that will cover it with an industrious and active population, and convert it from a wilderness to cultivated farms and flourishing villages. There is no portion of this vast country which contains so large an area of fertile land, in proportion to its extent of surface, as northern Missouri. Yet that fertile and beautiful region is, to a great degree, a waste, because it possesses no channel for the transportation of its products. Its citizens are almost entirely dependent upon the Missouri river for getting to and returning from the markets of the country. That river is closed to steamboats for four months every year, and during the remainder of the time it is so difficult of navigation that those who ship by it are subject to much higher charges for transportation and insurance than the citizens of the neighboring States. The consequence is, that the farmers who live in the interior of northern Missouri, are almost as effectually shut out from all commerce with other sections of the country as though they laid at the North pole. The Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad is to penetrate the very centre of that entire section, and will bring it as near market as some portions of the Atlantic States. Our farmers, stimulated by fair prices for their produce, will open large farms, and our products will be multiplied many fold. To the southern and eastern States we will sell stock, provisions, and our other staples. From them we will receive in return sugar, cotton, salt, rice, and fabrics. As our means increase our consumption will increase also. We will consume not only articles of domestic but of foreign manufacture, and thus, while we shall add to the home trade, we shall also increase the foreign commerce of the country, and swell the resources of the Government.

If a proposition were submitted to connect New York or Boston with the extreme settlements of Missouri, all would admit the importance of the enterprise. Some would be willing, no doubt, to construct the road at the expense of the nation. No such charge upon the Treasury is, however, required in order to consummate a railroad communication between the Missouri and the Atlantic seaboard. A railroad is nearly finished from New York city to Cincinnati. Indiana is extending this road to her western boundary. Illinois is extending it through her territory to the Mississippi river; and all that is necessary to complete the entire chain of railroad from Boston to Saint Joseph—indeed from Portland, Maine, to Saint Joseph—is to construct a railroad through the northern part of Missouri.

The people of Missouri have, by an act of their Legislature, appropriated $1,500,000 to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph railroad. Counties and individuals have taken a large amount of stock in the work. And now we ask Congress to do for us what they have so frequently done for other States. We ask you to give us alternate sections of the public lands, through which our road will pass, for six miles on each side of the road, to aid us in our enterprise. This is not a proposition to take money out of the Treasury. If it was I would not advocate it. The effect of the proposition will be, in my opinion, to increase the revenues of the Government. And why? Because the alternate sections reserved by the United States are not to be sold for less than two dollars and a half per acre. Now they are liable to entry at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. So that you will receive as much, at least, from the public lands if this grant be made, as you will receive if it fail. Do gentlemen fear that the value of the public domain will not be enhanced by our road? let me beg them to look at our condition, at our soil, as fertile as any in the world; at our situation, possessing none but the most expensive and tardy means of reaching a market, and then to reflect on the effect which similar roads have had elsewhere. No such work has ever been made even through the most densely settled sections, which has not greatly enhanced the real estate in its neighborhood. How much greater enhancement of lands must follow the construction of a railroad through such a section as northern Missouri. It is now occupied by some three hundred thousand people; it is capable of sustaining a population of several millions. The making a railway through it will pour immigrants into it until every foot of land shall be occupied and improved. Its citizens now need mills, schools, churches, and many of the comforts of life. A railroad will secure to them all these advantages at one and the same time. In view of these facts, it is a most stubborn skepticism which doubts that the construction of the Hannibal and Saint Joseph railroad will appreciate the lands near it twofold or more. That appreciation will not be confined to the lands within six miles of the road. It will extend to lands even fifteen and twenty miles from it. Public lands that are not worth fifty cents an acre will readily bring the minimum price. Lands that soldiers will not locate with their warrants will be eagerly sought for this purpose, and the income of the Government from the public lands will be greatly augmented. This is not fancy. During the last Congress millions of acres of public lands were given to soldiers. It was confidently predicted here and elsewhere that for many years we would, in consequence of the military grants, receive no money from the public lands; and yet we find that our revenues from that source have greatly increased within the last year, and are still rapidly increasing. Why is this? Solely because numerous railroads are projected in the new States through the public domain. Some of these roads are now constructing. They have so largely appreciated the public lands that millions of acres are now bought which until recently were a drug in the market. This fact, and this alone, explains why it is that the receipts from the public lands have increased, notwithstanding the bounty act of the last Congress and the immense emigration which has recently gone from the Western States to Oregon and California.

There is another piece of history in connection with this matter, to which I must refer gentlemen of the committee. The only acts granting lands to new States, besides the Illinois grant of 1850, in which the price of the alternate sections reserved by Government was doubled, are those relating to certain lands in Ohio. The amount of those reserved sections is 259,423.96 acres, of which, up to the 30th of September last, nearly one half had been sold for two dollars and fifty cents per acre. No returns have been received as yet from the lands reserved by the grant of the last Congress to the State of Illinois. But the case of the Ohio grant shows that the doubling of the price of the alternate sections reserved to the United States in internal improvement grants is not a nullity. It is a reality which secures the Government from all loss.

I trust it will be borne in mind, that under the acts granting land to soldiers, warrants can be located only on land subject to private entry. Now, all the lands in northern Missouri are subject to private entry, and have been for sixteen years and more. Whatever, therefore, adds to the value of these lands is for the benefit of soldiers having land warrants, whether in Maine, Virginia, or Texas. So that the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad grant is not only recommended by its intrinsic merits, but by the tendency it will have to benefit a large and most meritorious class of our citizens who are scattered all over the Union.

What is the extent of the grant I ask? I am able to answer this question from official documents. The whole amount of public lands within six miles of each side of the proposed route of the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad was, on the 11th day of April, 1847, 640,362 acres. A portion of these lands has passed into private hands since that time. All of them have been subject to private entry for many years—most of them sixteen years and upwards—so that they have been culled over and over again, and rejected as worth less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. The most that Missouri can receive by the grant I ask is 320,181 acres of refuse land. She would not probably receive more than 250,000 acres if the grant should pass to-day. And in return for that, she not only engages to construct a railroad which will enhance your public domain two or three times as much as this grant will amount to, but to carry your troops and munitions of war over the road free of all charge forever, and to transport your mails at such prices as you shall prescribe.

When Missouri came into the Union, the Federal Government required her to promise not to tax the public lands within her limits "for the term of five years from and after the day of sale." In consideration of this promise, the United States agreed to pay to the State of Missouri five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of lands lying within her limits, of which three fifths was to be applied to purposes of internal improvements by her Legislature; and "the other two fifths in defraying, under the direction of Congress, the expenses to be incurred in the making of a road or roads, canal or canals, leading to the said State." In order to discharge a public debt, the United States have granted some 70,000,000 or 80,000,000 acres of land to those who have been in our military service in a time of war. A large amount of those lands has been located in Missouri, and more will be located there still. Those lands not being disposed of by this Government for money, the State of Missouri receives nothing for exempting them from taxation. The strict letter of the compact does not, perhaps, entitle her to anything. But surely a fair and liberal spirit on the part of the United States will give Missouri some equivalent for not taxing the lands within her limits which have been and will be located by military warrants. Missouri supposed that she was to receive a valuable consideration for her agreement not to tax the public lands "for the term of five years from and after the day of sale." The United States so understood it. Now, suppose all the public domain in Missouri should be absorbed by land warrants, what would she receive for not taxing the lands of this Government? Nothing, absolutely nothing. And would that be a fair and bona fide execution of her compact with the United States on the part of the latter? On the contrary, would not the United States be obnoxious to the charge of "paltering in a double sense?" of keeping "the word of promise to our ear and breaking it to our hope?"

Missouri does not ask that the land given to soldiers should be treated absolutely as land sold for cash. All she asks is, that inasmuch as the policy of granting bounty land is for the benefit of citizens of every State, each State shall bear its proportion of whatever expense and burden that policy costs. Missouri is willing to give up a part of her three per cent., but she does not think she should be required to relinquish all. And it appears to me that this Government cannot discharge the equitable demands of Missouri on better terms to the nation than by making the grant I am urging.

When Missouri makes a road through the land of her citizens, the landed proprietors benefited by the work are compelled to pay their share towards its construction, in the form of taxes. As the value of their land is increased, their taxes are increased also. Now, this Government is a great landed proprietor, and owns large domains in the State of Missouri. Is it right, is it just, is it fair, under these circumstances, that while private individuals are compelled to pay for improvements which add to the value of their estates, the Federal Government should receive precisely the same benefits and not contribute one dollar? Let gentlemen from the old States revolve this matter in their minds, and I am sure they will dismiss some of the opposition which they manifest towards donations of lands to the new States.

It should be borne in mind that all the new States receive five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, for the purposes of internal improvements, except Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio. They receive but three per cent. for that object, the other two per cent. being retained in the Treasury for constructing, under the direction of Congress, a road or roads, a canal or canals, leading towards the limits of the enumerated States. It should also be remembered, that this portion of the public lands is not given to the new States as a gratuity. It is given in return for the non-taxation of the public domain for a term of "five years from and after the day of sale." This arrangement has never been a favorite with the new States. It originated with Congress, and was forced upon the Western States as a condition to their admission into the Union. From the statement just made, it will be perceived that Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, stand on precisely the same grounds, so far as their compacts with the United States are concerned. But how different, how widely different, is the treatment which Congress has meted out to them. In Ohio $2,812,034 21 have been expended on the Cumberland road. In Indiana $1,128,289 50, and in Illinois $742,445 30 have been spent on the same work. In Missouri not one single cent has been expended by this Government on any like enterprise. Besides this, Ohio has received upwards of eleven hundred thousand acres of public land for the purpose of internal improvements. Indiana has received upwards of fourteen hundred thousand acres, and Illinois has received upwards of three millions of acres for canals and railroads. Missouri has received nothing. Why this difference in the policy of Congress towards these four States? Is not Missouri faithful in the discharge of her duties to the Union? Is she not upright in her engagements with her sisters? Is she not worthy of membership in this Confederacy? I have never heard any such charges made against Missouri, and I trust that the neglect of Congress has been unintentional. There is certainly no equity in treating Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois with marked kindness, while you turn away from Missouri as from a step-child.

It is, however, objected, that the grants of land to the new States for the purposes of internal improvement are injurious to the old States. In what way? I inquire. It has been shown that those grants do not diminish the revenues of the country, but largely increase them. They diffuse the comforts and conveniences of life into many a habitation and family that are now cheerless. They spread education and intelligence. They build up school-houses and churches, and they bring into communion and friendly intercourse distant parts of the Republic. Surely there is nothing in all this of which any member of the Union ought to complain.

But if the policy of granting land to the new States for railroad purposes is to stop, let justice be done to both sections of the Union. Heretofore those grants have been confined almost exclusively to the free States. Let Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and other Southern States be placed upon an equal footing with Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, before you refuse all grants. To stop before this is done would give color, at least, to the charge sometimes made, that the majority of this House cannot and will not do justice to the Southern part of the Union.

The old States should not overlook the fact that they have received all the unappropriated lands which were within their limits at the date of the Revolution. Massachusetts and Maine, even at this moment, possess a large domain that is undisposed of. Now all of those lands were acquired by the common blood and treasure of the nation. The lands of Maine and Virginia and Georgia, which were unappropriated at the time of our Revolution, were as much the common acquisition of the whole Union, as the public lands in any of the Western States. But the old States, I reiterate, received every foot of unappropriated land within their limits. And yet when a new State asks for a small part of the public land within its limits, in discharge of high and important services, rendered by it in the construction of railroads through the Government domain, we hear the cry, Injustice to the old States. Place the new States on the same footing with the old States, and you would give them all the waste lands within their limits. This we do not ask. We are not so rapacious as the Atlantic States were when they occupied our position. All that we ask is a small appropriation, which, while it increases the receipts of the Treasury, will afford some remuneration for our services to the nation at large.

No other expenditure of public money has resulted in so much and so general good as that which has had for its object the settlement of the West. Separate the new States from the old ones; strike off the Valley of the Mississippi, even in imagination, from the Atlantic seaboard, and you will possibly form some small conception of the benefits which the settlement and improvement of the public lands have had upon our national wealth, greatness, and prosperity. The fortification of your coast, your Navy, your Army, are all useful; but no statesman will pretend that any one or all of these combined has contributed one tenth as much to our reputation abroad, or our security at home, as the settlement of the great West. Now, while the settlement of the West has been of greater advantage to the whole country than almost anything else which has transpired in our history, it has repaid by millions all the expenses it has occasioned to the Government. Your public domain has cost you $74,757,879 58. Up to this time it has yielded you $135,337,093 17—just $60,381,213 79 more than it cost you. If the Navy, besides protecting our commerce, had yielded to the Treasury double the money it has cost, how irresistible would be an application for an appropriation to that branch of the service! But the settlement of the public domain has operated in that manner. It has increased the general welfare, it has augmented the resources and multiplied the power of the country, and it has at the same time repaid to the Government two dollars for every one it has cost.

Will not gentlemen be instructed by the history of the past? Experience has taught us that every foot of land brought under cultivation in a new State adds to the wealth and prosperity of all. "The current of emigration, from one part of the Union to the other—from the old to the new States—rolls back a golden tide of trade and business. The old States now supply nearly all the wants of the farmers of the Valley of the West, and hence its prosperity wonderfully promotes the welfare of the older States of the Union. The poor emigrant from the old States, who establishes a farm in the West, soon contributes more to the wealth and commerce of the State he left than if he had remained there in dependent poverty. The prosperity of the new States reacts, through the channel of trade and business, in favor of the old States, and hence the wonderful growth of the whole country." This is a fair statement of the fact. Every man of observation knows it to be true, and still you hesitate to be liberal to the new States—no, sir, not liberal, but just.

Mr. Chairman, Congress should either graduate the price of the public lands, or aid in enhancing the value of those which have been for a long time in market. All the public lands near our navigable rivers are readily sold and settled. So it is with the best lands in the interior. But the public lands of the poorer class remain unoccupied for years after they have been subject to private entry, dividing neighborhoods, keeping settlements sparse, and rendering it impossible, very frequently, for our people to enjoy even the blessings of common schools. In order to remedy this evil, the new States have been applying to Congress for more than a quarter of a century to graduate the price of the public domain. This has been steadily refused. Now, in order to settle our waste lands, we ask you to aid in increasing its value, by grants to railroads, which will enable Government to sell the public domain at its present minimum in all cases, and at double the minimum in many instances.

I hope gentlemen will not oppose this policy because the new States are to be its immediate beneficiaries. What would be thought if the West should vote against a proposition to fortify an important seaport because the money necessary to that purpose would be expended on the coast? Why, everybody would say, such a motive is unworthy an American citizen. Will you, then, apply a rule to the new States, which, if sought to be applied to the old States, would be repudiated as disgraceful in its conception and purposes? Rather inquire whether the propositions relative to grants of land to the West, are for the benefit of the nation and within your constitutional power. And being satisfied in the affirmative on both propositions, do not withhold your support because the donation is to a new State.

Mr. SWEETSER. I feel justified in detaining the committee for a few moments by the great importance of the subject to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] has called the attention of the House. I desire to see, at the commencement of this session, a distinction taken, which I conceive to be important, to control our action in relation to the disposition of the public domain. This House was scarcely organized before there was anxiety manifested to obtain the floor in order to introduce bills for the purpose of obtaining the public lands in aid of private incorporations. That anxiety was not confined to any particular section of the Union. It was not confined to the great West. It is, therefore, important, if this system of granting the public lands is to be carried out by this Congress, that we should here, at the outset, get a fair start in relation to the principles on which these lands are to be granted. There can be no controversy in relation to the manner in which the Government holds these lands and for what purposes. They are the common property of all, and are held by the Government in trust for the benefit of all the States of this Union, and the people thereof; and whenever Congress undertakes to dispose of these lands, they should adopt a policy in so doing of fairness, not only to the Western States, but to all the States of this Confederacy. Care should also be taken to grant these lands to the States, and not to individuals or private corporations. We have presented before us a great number of these bills. During the last Congress, and already during the present Congress, they have hovered, like birds of ill omen, over this Hall, and it is highly important that we should look at once into the matter, and see whether these bills are sought by States, for the purpose of aiding in internal improvements, or whether it is the corporations of the country, now swarming in every State, that are here importuning this Congress to grant them portions of the public lands for their benefit, and not for the benefit of the States. It will be observed that the main object of these bills is professedly to obtain "a right of way" for the purpose of constructing these works of internal improvement through the public domain, and in addition to that, they ask for alternate sections of land. Now, I suppose that no lawyer in this House will rise and maintain here that the States of this Union have not the right of way through the public lands within their limits for the construction of State works of internal improvement, without asking it from Congress. The right of eminent domain belongs to the States, and I am here to-day for the purpose of maintaining that right in its full extent.

Mr. HALL. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to insist that a State in which the public domain is situated has a right to take that public domain for public purposes by paying compensation for it, just as in the case of individual property?

Mr. SWEETSER. The gentleman shall be answered. I maintain this, that whenever any States of this Union have projected a public work—either a railroad or a canal—that they desire shall pass through the public lands held by Congress in trust for all the States, they have the right of way without any act of Congress to give it to them. The right of eminent domain belongs to the States, and when gentlemen come here asking for an act of Congress to give them the right of way, it is evident that they have some ulterior object. Whenever any State of this Union comes here to ask a grant of public lands to aid in the construction of works which she has projected, and which she owns, she shall cheerfully have my vote to whatever extent she may desire. Ohio does not ask her representatives upon this floor to be guilty of any act that could be construed into meanness. I have to tell the gentleman from Missouri that all the grants which have been made to Ohio have been made to the State for the benefit of the State, and the works constructed are now the property of the State, with the solitary exception of the Columbus and Sandusky Turnpike Company.

Now, I will tell the committee why I make this distinction between grants to the States and grants to corporations. I doubt not only the propriety, but the constitutional power of this House to grant the public domain to the private corporations of the country, or to States for the purpose of aiding the private incorporations. Such a connection of public property or money is unsafe in such keeping, as all experience has demonstrated.

There is no State in this Union which has had a greater interest in public improvements than the State of Ohio. Early in 1824 she took the lead amongst the Western States in relation to internal improvements. Her two canals connecting the waters of Lake Erie with the Ohio river at Portsmouth and Cincinnati, are among her earliest efforts. The system was one of State policy and concern. I am glad to acknowledge that the munificent donations of public lands by Congress were important and necessary, and she has applied those grants faithfully and honestly, and her citizens here and elsewhere most cheerfully acknowledge their obligations. But, sir, Ohio has not perverted the object of the grants, and suffered her citizens to look upon her works of internal improvements now in the hands of incorporations or speculators.

I call upon the people's representatives here, at the very beginning of the session, to see who are the parties who are importuning Congress for grants of the public domain. Indiana has received large grants of the public domain. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana, to say whether all her grants have not been made to the State, in aid of works which she has projected, and which she ought now to control and own.

Mr. DUNHAM. I should like to know whether in any instance Congress has granted lands otherwise than to the States?

Mr. SWEETSER. The gentleman's special pleading will not avail him. Gentlemen will recollect, that though grants are sometimes made to the States, they are made for the purpose of benefiting corporations.

In the case of grants to Ohio, the specific objects to which the lands were to be applied, were embraced in the grants, and to those objects alone have the lands been applied.

It is true, that in all the various projects to which I am objecting, it is answered that the grants are to the States. What are the facts? In many cases the States that seek these grants are not engaged in any system of internal improvements. And in many cases these grants are asked in aid of roads that have never been surveyed or located. Acts of incorporation in the Western States have been granted for the last few years, without limit. The incorporators, in many instances, do not expect to organize and make a road, unless they can obtain grants of public land. The name of the State is used as a scape-goat in order to obtain grants of land. And my honorable friend well knows the fate of all public property in the hands of private incorporations. I will cite an example in my own State. Ohio, in 1837-'38, changed her policy, and called in the aid of private incorporations to carry out the extended policy of internal improvements in railroads, canals, and turn-pike roads. Upon the organization of companies, under various acts of incorporation, and the subscribing of a certain amount of stock, the State subscribed, and became a joint stockholder. What was the result? Out of about five millions of public money thus invested, one half is entirely lost, and the balance is unproductive. I speak her convictions, when she repealed the odious Plunder Law. And in the light of her experience I warn other States of this Union, that public money or public lands are unsafe in the care and custody of private incorporations.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. SWEETSER. I have but one remark to make further, and I will yield to the gentleman. I was about to speak of the Wabash Canal in the State of Indiana. Gentlemen are aware that public lands have been donated for the construction of that canal; and I do not hesitate to say that, as far as the people of that State are concerned, they have not derived the benefit which they had a right to expect from this canal. They permitted their interests to be entangled with private incorporations. What is the result? The Wabash Canal has been transferred to speculators, and is not now owned or controlled by the State. The consequence is, their canal is rendered almost valueless. I have seen whole fleets of canal boats stuck in the mud in consequence of bad management since the State has lost the control over it. I will now give way to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DUNHAM. I dislike very much to take up the time of the committee in the discussion of this question. But I deem it due to this body, that I should correct the assertions made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] in relation to the grants of Congress to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The grants to which the gentleman refers, were applied by the State of Indiana in good faith to the improvement for which they were designed, and that work remained entirely under the control of the State until after a considerable portion of it was completed. But, unfortunately, the State of Indiana, like other States, became involved to some extent in her exertions to develop her immense resources, and for the purpose of paying off those debts, she conveyed the work (the Wabash and Erie Canal) to her creditors, together with the lands then unapplied, until the income arising from the canal and from those lands should relieve her from those liabilities, or she should choose to redeem them by herself paying off these liabilities. She has not entirely relinquished her control over the canal or the lands.

I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] this question: What is the difference in principle between granting public lands to a State to be applied by her directly to her works of internal improvements, or granting them to her in such a way that she may, if in her sovereign wisdom she should deem it to her interest to do so, invest them in the stock of an incorporate company, which shall apply them in the construction of such works within her borders and for the benefit of her commerce and the convenience of her citizens, and thereby aid said companies in constructing such works? I ask if the gentleman's skill in political economy cannot discover any advantage in the expenditure of public money for works of internal improvement, more than simply the percentage which the stock invested may yield to the stockholders? Sir, my notions of political economy go beyond this. I apprehend that a State may derive advantage, not only from the percentage that may be derived from dividends, but she may also receive advantage from the improvement which those works may yield to that State in all the ways which the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] in his speech this morning, so ably enumerated—the improvement in her society, in the development of her resources, the improvement in her agricultural products, and in her commerce, and not only in the commerce of the State, but the commerce of the Union. But I desire also to allude to another thing.

Mr. SWEETSER. I beg to remind the gentleman that I only yielded for explanation, not for him to make a speech.

Mr. DUNHAM. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had concluded his remarks. I am sorry I have detained the gentleman so long.

Mr. SWEETSER, (resuming.) The gentleman cannot suppose that I am going into the question, to the full extent which he has suggested. I have a distinct object, and when that is effected I shall take my seat. But I will answer the gentleman's question. I had no intention of doing injustice to the sister State of Indiana. Her humiliation in the act to which I have alluded is sufficient for her, and it is not for me to augment her misfortunes or commit any act of unkindness to that fertile and promising State.

But I will not stop in my argument here; I appeal not only to the State of Indiana, but to the other States of this Union, for proof that the principle I have maintained is sanctioned by their experience. I have endeavored to enforce upon this House the danger of trusting the public property and the public money in the hands of corporations which are controlled by private individuals. I ask gentlemen to determine the question, whether it is not better that the public lands which are to be given to the States should be under the State control? I can appeal to the experience of the great State of New York in corroboration of the position I have assumed, as well as to the State of Ohio, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Ohio is certainly under a great misapprehension as to what I propose. My proposition is to grant land to the State of Missouri, not for the purpose of aiding a private corporation, but—

Mr. SWEETSER. I understand the gentleman's position perfectly. I think I shall not misrepresent him.

Mr. HALL. Well, I will say this to the gentleman: If the bill which I have had the honor to introduce this morning is not sufficiently guarded in its phraseology, to prevent the land from being squandered or passing into the hands of a private corporation, I ask him to suggest any amendment he may think proper, and I will adopt it. We want the land for the benefit of the State, and I desire as much as he does that it shall not go into the hands of a private corporation.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the honorable gentleman from Ohio allow me the floor but for one moment?

Mr. SWEETSER. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. I cannot allow the gentleman's remark about the humiliation of my State to pass without at least an answer.

If it is a humiliation to the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, to avail herself of the means which she honestly possessed for the purpose of paying her just debts, it is a humiliation of which I feel proud. After the United States had granted her this land for purposes of improvement, she did not divert them from the object for which they were granted; but while she appropriated them to that object, she has also paid her own debts, so that instead of its being a subject of humiliation, it is one of which every citizen of the State ought to be proud, and one of which the State is proud.

Mr. SWEETSER. My honorable friend will pardon me, I did not intend to place him or his State in a false position. But I submit this question to him: Has not the business of the canal to which I have alluded been impeded, in the manner which I have stated, week after week, in consequence of the canal having been sold into the hands of a private corporation?

Mr. DUNHAM. I will answer the gentleman. Is it not better the State should have received even these imperfect advantages, than to have received none at all? or is this a greater humiliation than that her debt should have gone unpaid? That is the answer I make; and besides, that work is not in the hands of a private corporation, but it is under the control of trustees, part appointed by the creditors of the State and part by the State, so that the interests of both parties are provided for and protected; and I will further add, that the work is at least as well conducted now as it was when under the sole control of the State, and affords as ample facilities for our commerce.

Mr. SWEETSER. The gentleman has the full benefit of his answer. It is not my object in making these remarks to oppose any particular bill. My objection is to the whole class and to the principle involved. I do not propose to go into the details of the bill of my honorable friend [Mr. HALL] at this time. I am speaking of general principles which, in my judgment, should control the action of this House in relation to the whole class.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I have no doubt the gentleman will give his active support to my bill.

Mr. SWEETSER. When my honorable friend interrupted me, I was proceeding to remark upon the policy of several States upon this subject of internal improvements. New York was one of the first to embark in these enterprises, and having carried them to a length beyond that of any other State, a short time since, in a convention called for the purpose of amending her constitution, she inserted a provision, as a part of her organic law, prohibiting her Legislature from raising a single dollar by taxation, to be invested in any corporation whatever. That is the policy of the great State of New York; a policy which has been forced upon her by such dire necessities that she has made it a part of her organic law. Ohio, too, has had some experience in this matter, and in a convention recently held in that State for the purpose of remodeling her constitution, a provision was adopted similar to that of New York. I do not believe there is a State in this Union which is so deeply interested in relation to these subjects as the State which I have the honor in part to represent. I speak from what I know in relation to this matter. Representing, as I do, the centre of that State, I know perfectly well the responsibility I take upon myself in opposing some of these measures in relation to granting public lands. I have no desire to oppose the plans of the gentleman from Missouri, except upon the principles stated.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I have no plans. All I desire is, that while Congress has done justice to one State it should not refuse to do justice to another.

Mr. SWEETSER, (resuming.) I maintain that where grants of land have been made by Congress to Western States, they have uniformly been made for the purpose of aiding in the construction of works already projected by and owned by the State. They have not been appropriated for the aid of private corporations. I know that this system of giving away these lands for works of internal improvement has become quite popular in this House. Gentlemen will recollect that during the last Congress one of the strongest arguments used against the bounty land bill was, that it would destroy this land system. It was said it would destroy the prospect of obtaining these lands in aid of these works of improvement. I desire now for a moment to call the attention of the committee to the bill passed by the last Congress appropriating lands for the construction of a railroad in Illinois. Gentlemen will recollect that the bill was passed at a time when this House and the country were excited to a degree which forbade its receiving that discussion and deliberation which it should have had. But for those circumstances that bill would never have passed Congress. It never would have received my vote; and had I been present when it was under consideration, I should have raised my voice in opposition to it.

I repeat, that whenever a State comes forward and asks an act of Congress granting the right of way for a State work, or a railroad through the public domain, the State concedes the point that the proposed road or canal is a private enterprise, under the control of a corporation, for the reason that if it is a State work, no such legislation is necessary. If alternate sections are wanted, then the object is to obtain the public lands in aid of private incorporations. The right of way is a mere pretext. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] will pardon me when I say, that before he attempts to force his conclusions upon the House, it is his duty to prove that it is necessary for a State to obtain an act of Congress granting the right of way over the public lands, which I deny.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I have no doubt in the world that the assent of Congress is absolutely necessary before a State can make a railroad through the public domain. There is no question about it. If we have the right to take the public domain for making a railroad, we have the right to take it as individual property; we have the right to take just as much as we require for public purposes.

Mr. SWEETSER, (resuming.) I think the gentleman is in error in relation to this matter. We are at issue upon the legal proposition.

The people desire that some disposition should be made of these public lands. My honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] will excuse me when I allude to him. The bill he reported to this House upon yesterday will meet with public favor, and shall have my cordial support. I hope this Congress will not adjourn until it passes that bill, or one embodying its principles. It will be a matter of public justice, not only to the new States but to the old States of this Union. It will open up to the people of New England—those men who have been reared upon a barren and sterile soil—an object, an inducement to emigrate to a more congenial climate and locality better suited to the purposes of life. Sir, I shall go with my honorable friend from Tennessee in this matter, and I hope, when a proper occasion shall present itself, to be able to lay before this House and the country some considerations in relation to the importance of that measure. If you give this public domain to the actual settlers, you not only furnish efficient aid for the construction of works of internal improvement, but you assist in bearing the burdens of the State. Extend this invitation to the people of all the States of this Union, and to the agricultural world, and you will be but carrying out the trust which is placed in your hands as the people's representatives, but you furnish to the laboring man of the Eastern States of this Confederacy a home in a more congenial climate. You furnish him, also, with a farm sufficient to sustain him and his family after him. That wise measure will extend to the cultivator of the soil an inducement to emigrate from all sections of the country into this land of promise—"The Great West."

I entered upon this discussion, without preparation, upon the impulse of the moment. My object was to call the attention of the House at this early stage to the various projects for absorbing the public lands; to the danger that these various bills import; and to give, if possible, a proper direction to our action. If I have succeeded in making myself understood, I am content to await the action of this House in disposing of a subject of such vital importance in the disposition of a trust of such grave importance.

Mr. BISSELL. Upon some future occasion, if I can get an opportunity, I design to present my views at some length upon the subjects embraced in the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] but not now. I rise upon the present occasion merely to indicate my intention to support this bill in precisely the shape in which it now stands. I do not mean to assert that the bill in every feature meets my entire approbation, not having examined it particularly. But the general features of the bill—the leading objects and main provisions contained in it, I shall support, not because similar grants have been asked for and made to other States, but because I believe the true policy of the Government with regard to the public lands will be carried out by the adoption of the provisions therein contained. I hold that it is perfectly susceptible of demonstration that the true interest—the pecuniary advantage, if you please—of this Government would be promoted thereby, as would the happiness and prosperity of its individual citizens.

Mr. Chairman, there was a time when Ohio—not then so rich as she is now—clamored loudly and ceaselessly in these Halls for grants of public lands to make railroads—to make canals and other improvements. She worried the Government until she obtained the grant of Congress for tracks of as fine land as this Government ever owned. She applied it to purposes of improvement, and put the money derived therefrom into her treasury. She continued to press her claims to the full extent of her power, and continued to get land from the Government until there was no longer any public lands within her borders. Then comes up Missouri, young and poor now, as Ohio was then, and asks for about one third as much public land as Ohio has received, for a similar object; and Ohio, if correctly represented here, starts up and demands that justice shall be done—that all the States shall receive an equal share. Now, if these notions had prevailed at the time—

Mr. SWEETSER, (interrupting.) The gentleman entirely misunderstands me. Ohio is not and has not been here, through any representative, asking that the public domain shall be given to corporations within the State. She never asked any such boon from Congress or the Government; she asked for public land to aid in improvements which had already been projected, which she constructed herself, and which she now owns. She has not asked aid for any corporation.

Mr. BISSELL, (resuming.) No, sir, she asked for herself, just as Missouri does. Does that change the case? She asked for herself and she obtained for herself, just as Missouri now asks for herself, and, by the justice of this House, I trust, will obtain for herself. When Ohio had secured the land, she made such disposition of it as she deemed best for herself—just as Missouri will do, and just as this Congress or any other power has no right to prevent her or Ohio from doing.

A MEMBER: That was granted for a specific object.

Mr. BISSELL. So is this asked for a specific object—to be invested as the State deems best for its own interest. Is the gentleman not willing that Missouri shall take care of herself? Does he want to provide, by a law of Congress, that Missouri shall dispose of her own in a particular way, when Ohio did what she pleased with hers? If she has chosen since, or shall choose hereafter, to sell or give away any of the improvements made by the land she got from Congress, may she not do it? Has she not the power? Well, then, is it not perfectly idle to say that there ought to be some provision made by law that the land to be given to Missouri shall be invested in a particular manner—that the work proposed shall be made by her as a State? Would she not, the very moment it was completed, be at liberty to give it away, or sell it? Why not, then, leave her at liberty to dispose of the land to a company chartered to build the work, or to build the work herself? Why not give her full power from the first, as she will of course possess over the work after it is completed?

I hold that every State may be safely intrusted with its own affairs. The gentleman wants a system which shall be just and equitable to all classes and to all portions of the Union, and therefore he will oppose this bill, and will support the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] So shall I support that bill. Will that bill be just to all classes? Let us see. That proposes, if I recollect aright, to give to each settler a certain amount of land, perhaps one hundred and sixty acres, on condition he will reside on and cultivate it. I ask if it is just to merchants and manufacturers? Does it give as equal advantages to operatives in New England, New York, and elsewhere, as it does to the agricultural classes in the West? Not at all. In the nature of things they cannot avail themselves of it. Does it hold out any advantage to the blacksmith, cooper, or shoemaker pursuing his business—the only business in which it is competent for him to obtain a livelihood. None at all. It is the agricultural class, and that alone that will derive any advantage from the bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] The friends of the bill say, support it, because it is just to all classes of the people; but it seems to me reasonable to oppose the bill, because it is partial. I do not design at present to say anything more; but upon some subsequent occasion more favorable than the present one, I will again express my opinions more at length.

Mr. SEYMOUR called for the reading of the eighth resolution; and it was read.

Mr. S. yielded the floor to

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, on whose motion the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the President's message under consideration, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ABRAHAM P. STEVENS, of New York, appeared, was sworn in, and took his seat.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. HOUSTON said that it was important that the Executive messages on the Speaker's table should be referred and printed. He hoped that the House would consent to their presentation.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, agreeably to the act of Congress of March 28, 1796, covering a statement showing the number of seamen registered in the several collection districts of the United States during the year ending 30th of June, 1851; which, on motion of Mr. HOUSTON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FORTIFICATIONS—JURISDICTION OF THE MILITARY COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the Secretary of War on the subject of fortifications, prepared in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 3d, 1851.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the report be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, did not think that the gentleman from Illinois had proposed the proper reference. He supposed that the report was upon the subject of the defenses, and as such the Committee on Commerce had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BURT. I understand that that report relates not merely to the continuance of fortifications, but to the beginning of a system of fortifications, which may materially modify that now existing in the United States. It is known to the House, and indeed the rules of the House expressly prescribe, that all propositions for fortifications, whether to authorize or reject them in any way whatever, are proper subjects for the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not see my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who introduced a resolution to which this report is in answer. He intimated to me that he might move to refer the report to a select committee. I can see no sort of propriety in that reference. There certainly is none in referring the report to the Committee on Commerce. It is a matter which properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I trust the House will not give it the direction of any other committee, unless some special cause be assigned. If that committee be a fit one for the duties which are devolved upon it by the rules of the House, it is a special act for its consideration. If the Committee on Military Affairs know anything of military subjects, they should know something of the system of fortifications. I am satisfied that that committee does not entertain any hostility to fortifications, and that it does not entertain any views that are adverse to the known views of the Administration or Department of War, and that it will be disposed to carry out, as far as may be consistent with its own views of good policy, any recommendation or suggestion of that Department. I trust the report will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I hope that the direction which the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] not now in his seat, desired the report should take may be given to it, and that it may go to a select committee, for the reasons afforded by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that that committee did not entertain any hostility to the system of fortifications, and are willing to carry out the views of the Administration or Department in that particular.

Mr. BURT. If they are proper.

Mr. MARSHALL. The system of fortifications, or rather appropriations for the continuance of the system of fortifications, came, I supposed, from the Committee on Military Affairs at the last Congress, but it did not meet the approval of the House of Representatives. The fortification bill was defeated in the House. The Congress of the United States indicated its determination, by its defeat, to put an end to the system. I do not know how the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] happened to call for this exposé from the Department, but I suppose that the report lying upon your table is an additional plea, upon the part of the Engineer Corps, for the continuance of the system in the old mode, or under some modification. I take it, if the Congress of the United States meant anything last year by the vote they gave on the subject, they meant this, that they ought not to throw this matter upon the Committee on Military Affairs, whose appropriations for fortifications in the last Congress were killed, and they ought not to trust this document from the Department to their keeping, but give it a special direction.

Mr. BURT. If my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] will allow me, I beg to say to him, that the bill on the subject of fortifications which was defeated the last session of Congress in this House, did not come from the Committee on Military Affairs, but from the Committee of Ways and Means. It was a bill to continue fortifications that had been commenced, and to make repairs upon those which had been completed. I hope my friend will allow me to say, that he has misconceived my remarks in relation to the policy of the Administration or the Department of War. What I did say, or certainly what I intended to say, was, that the Committee on Military Affairs have no hostility to any views of the Administration that are known, which they deem consistent with good policy. That committee will give to all recommendations of the War Department a free, candid, just, and impartial consideration.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have no recollection of the facts, and I stand corrected as to the fact that this fortification bill, which was defeated in the last Congress, may have come from the Committee of Ways and Means. I supposed, as a matter of duty, that the Committee on Military Affairs, if it was an act especially under their cognizance, had transferred it. If they did not have the responsibility of it, it is the very best argument to show why they should now have no business with it; and as a matter of course it would lay the axe at the root of the claim which they set up here why it should be transferred to them, as a matter coming within their peculiar cognizance. I do not know what the views of the Administration are about fortifications, nor do I care; but I know what my own views are. I know what the views of the last Congress were upon it, and I am acting in continuance of those views. The Military Committee having their attention engaged, perhaps, exclusively in regard to the army—in regard to the defence of our southwestern frontier—the Pacific frontier—in regard to the transportation of the army—in regard to those bills which necessarily fall within their cognizance—will have a busy time of it—so busy a time of it to pass upon the policy of continuing or modifying this system of fortifications. I have no particular interest in this matter. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN], to whose resolution this report is a reply, remarked to me yesterday, that he had a strong desire that this matter should go to a select committee. Not finding him in his seat, as a matter of courtesy to him, I move its reference to a select committee.

Mr. CARTTER. I hope the subject will take the direction desired by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] I hope it may, under the indication of the House, that the system of appropriations for useless fortifications may terminate. It is true that the subject is in the prerogative of the Committee on Military Affairs, as I understand it. It is equally true that, as a standing committee, they are in the habit of carrying out the recommendations of the Department. Having been upon that committee for two years, I understand its practice. The Committee of Ways and Means took charge of the subject at the last session, followed out the appropriation recommended by the President, and then the House took charge and pinned it to the wall.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Committee of Ways and Means at the last Congress took charge of no proposition, I believe, connected with appropriations or fortifications which was not referred to that committee. The estimates submitted by the War Department, through the Treasury Department, for the support and continuance of fortifications, were referred to that committee. The Committee of Ways and Means, in pursuance of these estimates, reported a bill making appropriations for the continuance and maintenance of such fortifications as they thought should be established, and when that bill came here there were one or two of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means who cooperated with those who thought the system was a bad one and should be stopped, and they exerted themselves to defeat the bill. This is a different proposition. We will again have the estimates for fortifications when we get the other estimates, and they of course will go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

If I have any knowledge of what this report is, it is, as to the continuance or discontinuance of some fortifications, or the establishment of others upon a different basis from that now prevailing. If so, it goes legitimately and properly, under the rules of the House, to the standing Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CARTTER. I am glad to hear a response that the Committee of Ways and Means had charge of appropriations for fortifications. It was a new duty which they had fathered.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman misunderstood me, and I wish to correct him. I say that the Committee of Ways and Means at the last Congress had the estimates for fortifications referred to them. In pursuance of that reference and those estimates, in the discharge of their duty they reported a bill to the House. This is upon a different subject altogether.

Mr. CARTTER. I understood the gentleman as I do now—that the Committee of Ways and Means had in charge the subject now proposed to be referred; that they had in charge certain appropriations recommended to them by the Department, a part of which they adopted and a part rejected. The gentleman remarks again—that we are all informed of—that this is a special communication from the President, under a resolution of the House, designed to test the necessity of the continuation of fortifications, and the character of these fortifications. The fact that this communication is called out by special resolution, and the fact that it is a special communication to this House, proposing new measures in reference to fortifications, argues the propriety of committing the whole subject to a select committee. I do not wish to discuss this matter at all; but I am anxious to have that communication go to a special committee for the reason that I believe it will receive the attention that a special committee will give it, unprejudiced by the recommendation of the Department; unprejudiced by the habit of a standing committee in responding to the recommendations of the Department. It is under the conviction that a special committee will put an end to the whole system; will reflect the will of the nation as it was reflected in the last Congress in reference to the subject, that I desire the reference of the subject to a select committee. The last Congress refused to give anything for fortifications. If this Congress is wise, it will also so refuse, and put an end to this drain upon the Treasury, without any benefit to the country. We have learned the important fact, that when a man wants to be shot at he does not conceal himself behind a fortification. [Laughter.] I hope the bill may be referred to a special committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. A single word. The 91st rule prescribes that "it shall be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to take into consideration all subjects relating to the military establishment and public defence which may be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment."

Mr. CARTTER. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single inquiry?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CARTTER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] read that rule for the purpose of convincing this House that they have not the power of committing this subject to a special committee?

Mr. JONES. Not at all. I read that rule for the purpose of letting the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] and this House see what is the proper duty of the Committee on Military Affairs; and that this report, now before the House from the War Department, is one of the legitimate duties of that committee. If I understand the object of the gentleman from Ohio, in having this special committee raised, and this report referred to it, if you follow the parliamentary rule in organizing that committee, his object will be defeated. The standing committees of this House are organized upon broad national principles, in view of the subjects which shall be legitimately referred to them, and which have claims to their consideration. This subject is one of that character. It is proposed to refer it, however, to a special committee.

The report, we are told, proposes to modify in some degree the system of fortifications, establish a new system, and discontinue the old one. What will be the rule which should govern you in the appointment of that special committee? It will be to give this report into the hands of a favorable committee—to commit the child to its friends; and then, perhaps, you may expect, instead of an adverse report, a favorable one. If a special committee should be organized upon this principle, and in pursuance of the common law which governs all deliberative and legislative bodies, then I say the gentleman from Ohio is not acting in such a manner as to secure his object, and procure the kind of report which I should think he was desirous of securing from his remarks. I think, therefore, that it is right and proper that this report should go to the standing Committee on Military Affairs, and not to a select committee. If the duties and business assigned to these committees are to be taken from them and referred to special committees, we had better at once abolish all rules requiring their appointment; and whenever a subject has to be referred, send it to a special committee. I will go as far as the gentleman from Ohio, or any other gentleman upon this floor, in arresting not only appropriations for fortifications, but any other unnecessary, extravagant, and wasteful appropriations.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand that in my absence, which has been but a few moments, a motion has been made by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] to refer this subject to a select committee. There was some little conversation between us on yesterday, and we both came to the conclusion that it would be the proper course. I will briefly state the reasons which operated upon my mind for making that suggestion to him. It will be recollected that at the last session the House rejected the fortification bill. The object of those, no doubt, who rejected it was not to refuse absolutely all appropriations for fortifications, but to obtain a change in the existing system. The bill was rejected, notwithstanding it received the sanction of the standing committee of this House. The Military Committee sanctioned the bill, and the chairman desired its passage.

Mr. BURT. I merely desire to say to my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that the Committee on Military Affairs never saw that bill until it was reported to the House. It was a bill which my friend will remember was reported, under the rules of the House, by the Committee of Ways and Means. We had nothing to do with it, and we did not see it, and some of the committee opposed it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will ask the gentleman if he did not urge the House to pass the bill?

Mr. BURT. Not at all. The gentleman is totally at fault. I believe that I made the first assault upon the fortification bill at a prior session of the last Congress. I think I was not in the House when it was voted upon at the last session of Congress.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no doubt the gentleman attacked the bill two or three years ago. The system has been attacked again and again. My impression was that the gentleman at the last session of Congress desired its passage; but I may be wrong in that. The object of the House in defeating that bill, was to change the system and substitute a new one, less extensive. That bill, or a similar bill, has regularly received the sanction of the House for many years past. It is known to those who have looked into the subject, that in 1816 a system of fortifications was adopted. That system proposed that one hundred and fifty seven forts should be built. Congress has gone on, from year to year, making appropriations. Up to this time fifty or sixty forts have been completed, or are in progress. More than one hundred have yet to be touched. We have gone on in this way, making appropriations from year to year; but a feeling prevailed in this House and in the country, that a change had taken place in the art of war—a great change, in the last few years, in the condition and strength of the country, which did not require a system of fortifications so extensive as this. Upon these grounds the House rejected the bill, and these resolutions were offered, therefore, with a view of retrenching the existing system. I understand—for I have had occasion to get some knowledge of that report since it came in two or three days since—that the Secretary recommends important changes in the system of fortifications, against the advice of the Corps of Engineers. He recommends that a large portion of the forts they propose to complete, shall be abandoned. Now I do not see how the Military Committee should have charge of this subject exclusively. It may be as well referred to a naval as a military officer, and in fact, the Secretary has furnished the opinions of naval men upon the subject. If the object is to defend our sea-coast mainly against naval attacks, the Naval Committee might just as well claim it.

The ground upon which I maintain that a special committee is proper is, that there is to be an entire change of the system, if the policy adopted at the last session of Congress is to be carried out. I have great respect and confidence for the Military Committee of this House as well as the Committee of Ways and Means. I know that the chairmen of these committees, to whom this subject has been heretofore referred, have regularly sanctioned the recommendations of the Engineer Department. I do not say that the gentleman did sanction it as chairman of his committee. It is a matter of complaint with many Army officers that we have been making appropriations for twenty or thirty years to finish forts; and we have had a large number of men superintending these works and receiving salaries, but the works are never finished. What I desire is, that we may go on and finish the works necessary. The Secretary states that about $16,000,000 have been appropriated to existing fortifications—to those which have been built or are now in progress; and that the sum of five or six millions of dollars will complete them; and that it will take at least $20,000,000, perhaps more than that sum, to finish the other one hundred that are proposed to be built. I will say this to the House, that originally they classified the forts proposed to be built into six classes; when they had completed those in the first and second classes, the third was put in progress. Those forts are of the most important character, and necessary to the defence of points of importance on the sea-coast, as they protect a vast amount of property in our large cities. I rather think that Boston and New York are now pretty well fortified. Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Charleston, and other points, need something further. The works now in progress will enable us to protect these cities against attacks where there is a large amount of property invested, but no one supposes that every inlet into which a steamer can run shall be defended. I will here make another suggestion to the House: It will require an army of sixty-five thousand men, according to the estimate, to man these fortifications; and that is a larger army than we have ever had. If you do not put troops there, the enemy will attack and seize upon some of those fortifications. I consider the movement a judicious one in which to review the whole system—to finish promptly the forts which are already begun, and to abandon those which may be deemed unnecessary.

There are some other suggestions connected with the report of the Secretary which I do not desire to dwell upon now. I do not desire to have control of this question; my only desire is that the subject may receive that direction which will insure something being done. It was the business of the Military Committee, charged with the defence of the country, to have brought in recommendations for retrenchments, but, either from supineness or some other cause, they failed to do it. That may well justify the House in confiding the subject to a special committee. I hope the House will act upon the suggestion of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and refer the subject to a select committee, who will make that their special business—examine the large voluminous documents—bring in a report, so that we may see what ought to be done.

Mr. CARTER. After this disclosure of purpose of the gentleman, and after the development of the contents of the budget that is proposed to be submitted, in justice to my own views, I am under the necessity of backing out of the proposition to refer the matter to a special committee. [Laughter.] I am satisfied that the honorable member from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] misapprehended the direction of the sentiment of the last Congress. If I understood it, it was an unyielding sentiment. Just stop there with this plunder, and not patch up a new system; but it appears that the Department has gone to work, under the resolution of the honorable gentleman, to propose a new one. There is no new system of public expenditure that can be proposed by this Government that will not swallow up more than the flanks of the old one.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My remarks may have done injustice to the Secretary. I will state this: that the original plan adopted in 1816 was a very extensive one. The Secretary recommended that a large number of these forts be abandoned, and leaves it to Congress to say whether they shall finish those in progress or not. I do not wish it to be understood that we should have any new system. The only question is, whether we shall abandon the old system partially or entirely.

Mr. CARTER. If there is in this projected reformation a new system of fortifications, I am opposed to organizing a select committee for that purpose. If I understood the sentiment of the last House of Representatives it was to close the gates upon this useless expenditure. That is the only method of getting rid of it; that is the only sentiment which I would sanction. I had no idea at that time, that a Phoenix was to rise from the ashes of the dead. If I understood the action of the last Congress, it was, upon the subject of fortifications, a finality—a totality. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURT. Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should say a few words in relation to the Committee on Military Affairs. I cannot comprehend how that gentleman [Mr. CLINGMAN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] could have been brought to think that the Committee on Military Affairs had charge of the fortification bill at the last session, or were in favor of it. The misapprehension may have arisen from the fact that I felt it my duty to defend the estimates of appropriations that were made for the Army—a bill, too, which was reported to this House by the Committee of Ways and Means, and a bill with which the Committee on Military Affairs had nothing whatever to do. Feeling it to be my duty to defend a bill containing estimates for the Army which I deemed indispensable for the service, I did not hesitate to do so, while gentlemen who sat upon that side of the House assailed that bill with great fierceness, and with unfortunate success. I stated, what this House will very soon see is true, that a demand would be made this session of Congress for supplying the deficiencies of that service, which were caused by striking out some of the items in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. Very large deficiencies have arisen, and the House will be called upon to supply them.

I do not understand what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] means, when he speaks of the supineness of the Military Committee preventing it from discharging its duties.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that my remark was this: that the Committee on Military Affairs, whose business it was, and who claim it as their appropriate duty to look into the appropriations for these military fortifications, from supineness, or some other cause, (what it is the gentleman has not yet explained,) failed to make any movement in favor of retrenchment whatever during the whole two years.

Mr. BURT. Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] is quite as unfortunate in his phraseology as before. And, sir, I am to be understood as speaking, not with reference to myself, but in justice to that committee. The Committee on Military Affairs of the first session of the last Congress—I believe at their very first meeting—with unanimity determined to retrench very materially the expenses of the organization of the Army. The gentleman from North Carolina will remember that a Whig Secretary of War was then at the head of the Department, as there is now. It was deemed a matter of courtesy to that gentleman, and of common decency to the committee and the country, that the Secretary of War should be called upon to aid the Committee on Military Affairs in their work of retrenchment. He was called upon, but the aid was never rendered. We all know, who were members of that Congress, and the whole country knows, that the deliberations of both Houses of Congress very soon became engrossed by very exciting subjects. It was almost impossible to enforce upon the attention of either House of Congress any matter of ordinary legislation; and we were thwarted—I will not say by the supineness of the Secretary of War, or by the negligence—

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) If the committee desired retrenchment, why did they not bring in a report to that effect?

Mr. BURT. The gentleman from North Carolina will see that any intelligent report to retrench such an immense establishment as the Army of the United States, or even the fortifications of the United States, which he has shown to be so very large; or the man who would strike with intelligence and discernment at that system, would require great labor and research. I say he cannot do it intelligently without the aid of the War Department. We may apply the knife, but we are just as apt to strike an artery as an unsound limb; and I would like to see, sir, from the disclosure the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] has made, how he, at the head of a select committee, would be able to dispatch so soon the Herculean labor proposed in the report of the Secretary of War. I have no doubt he can do it. I have no doubt of his industry and energy; and I suppose the work would not be delayed by his supineness. I should like to see it; but, sir, if this subject is to be referred to a select committee, I ask of this House that the whole subject of the Army be referred to that committee. And I would like to see the gentleman from North Carolina

[Mr. CLINGMAN] at the head of that committee. I trust he is much better prepared for these military duties than are the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that he will perform them with great discretion and intelligence, and that the country will be immensely benefited by the result of his labors. I shall be glad to hear of it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It was my purpose, in the event of the approval by the House of a select committee, that it should be given to some military gentleman like my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who has been in service. I am but a civilian. I did not wish to have the charge of it, because there were others here more competent than myself to discharge the duties.

Mr. BURT. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman would do it justice. I think it unfortunate that the gentleman from North Carolina did not suggest to you, when you were appointing the committees of this House, that there were gentlemen in the House who could perform these duties so admirably. I am sure the country would have been indebted to him for the suggestion which would conduce to such immense retrenchment. Now, upon the subject of retrenchment, it is needless to say how far I have gone. I fear I have sometimes gone too far. I can say, with a clean breast, that I have never supported anything which I considered an abuse; and I would be willing to compare notes upon that point of economy even with my friend from North Carolina—even with him. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not to be disguised—as I have had the honor to say upon this subject heretofore to-day—that there are numerous abuses in the Army, affording immense work for the knife of retrenchment; and I would like to see that instrument used, even by the skillful hand of my friend from Kentucky, or any other gentleman who would wield it wisely and effectively. I have tried to reach it. I would have done it, had I got the aid necessary to success at the first session of the last Congress. Every one knows that nothing could be done at the last session of Congress, as it was too short. No system could be matured. I have, in the Committee on Military Affairs, day after day, opposed applications for new fortifications. I have complained of the corps of engineers—one of the most admirable corps, however, in the world. I have complained that they have not made their recommendations for new fortifications with a proper discernment. I have, upon that ground, opposed many applications for new fortifications, that they were intended for the purpose of mere local expenditure, without regard to the great interests of the country.

I have endeavored to conceive some plan—for we can have no system of fortifications in the United States upon our immense sea-coast—by which the most important points of our coast would be defended. No man who has looked at the extent of our coast can suppose that every desirable point upon it may be defended by fortifications. It is impossible. And while I am utterly uninformed of the suggestions of the report upon your table, I confess, sir, I have great curiosity to hear them. I hope the Secretary of War may have suggested something that will enable us to improve entirely our plan of fortifying our coast. We can have no connected system of fortifications, such as prevails in many countries of Europe. In my opinion they are unnecessary here. I know that very many of these fortifications have been sought as the mere means of expending money in certain localities of our country. I hope all such abuses, as I conceive these to be, will be cut off by this report of the Secretary of War; and what the report is, I repeat, I am wholly uninformed. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the House will do me the justice to understand that I have no desire to increase my own labors, or those of the committee of which I am a member; but, sir, you know, as does every old member of Congress well understand, that a subject is not referred to a select committee unless there be some special reason for it, such as the idea that the measure will not receive a candid and just consideration from the standing committee of the House; and if this House are of the opinion that the Committee on Military Affairs, which has been so recently appointed, will not bestow such consideration upon this report, I beg them to refer it to such committee as will. If there be no such imagination upon the part of this House, I repeat that I cannot see why the proper, the legitimate, the fitting duties of that committee should be delegated to a select committee of the House.

Mr. BOCK. As my friend from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is not in, I rise to renew his call for the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment—

Mr. BOCK. The gentleman, I believe, has already addressed the House upon this subject; and with all courtesy and respect to him, I decline to withdraw my call for the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will say to my friend from Virginia, that the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] was about to withdraw his motion for a reference to a select committee.

Mr. BOCK. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MARSHALL. I only intend to say, Mr. Speaker, that my motion to refer this subject to a select committee, was done as an act of courtesy to my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who intimated his wish to institute this inquiry, and that it was not done by way of relieving the Military Committee of what seemed to be a legitimate part of their duty; and certainly not with a view of disparaging the ability with which the chairman of that committee has always discharged his duties.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to say, Mr. Speaker, that I mentioned to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, my design of making this motion, and communicated to him the reasons that governed me. I prefer that it should be withdrawn. He understood that I was to make it, and knew my object in doing so.

Mr. BURT. I beg to inform the gentleman from North Carolina, in his absence this morning I felt it my duty to state to the House that he had intimated to me his purpose of moving for a select committee.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel desirous of prolonging this discussion. I certainly never dreamed that in making the motion for the raising of a select committee, it would be the intention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] to shift the responsibility upon my shoulders. I certainly did not propose to trespass in the slightest degree upon the management of the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BURT.] I will take this occasion to observe, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, touching the deficiency bill, which he promised to this House—which he has spoken of as being the consequence of our failure to carry out the estimates as they came from the Department—that whenever the House of Representatives of this country, after denying to the Executive Department appropriations they have asked from us, are found consenting to meet those appropriations when expended, in the shape of a deficiency bill, it will be time for the representatives of the people to surrender their powers here, and the sooner they go back to the bosom of the people the better. I take this occasion to say, that for not a dollar of such deficiencies will I ever vote, and I do hope that the House of Representatives will never be found ready or willing to vote a dollar. We applied the knife to the Quartermaster's department. It may be we struck in the dark; but whenever the Quartermaster's department, or any other department, undertakes, in the absence of Congress, after appropriations have been refused, to make such expenditures, and come here expecting them in the shape of deficiency bills, then will be the time to assert our privileges as the representatives of the people, and the guardians of their Treasury. I withdraw my motion.

The report was then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OTHER SUBJECTS.

[A message was received from the Senate informing the House that that body had elected the Rev. Mr. BUTLER as their Chaplain.]

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, in obedience to the requirements of the act of July 10, 1832, comprehending lists of the names of the invalids, widows, and orphans, now on the naval pension roll of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the House the report of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, showing the expenditures out of the contingent fund, and for stationery, for the year ending 1st December, 1851; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the House a communication transmitting the acts of the Greek House of Representatives, for the sessions of 1848 and 1849, presented by that body to the House of Representatives of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motion by Mr. MOLONY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files, for the purpose of reference to one of the executive departments, the petition and papers of Mary Stanton, the widow of Eldridge Stanton.

On motion by Mr. BISSELL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claims of Antoine Peltier and Nicholas La Chance be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That when the House adjourns it be till Monday next.

PROPOSED BOUNTY.

Mr. AIKEN asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read for information as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of allowing bounty land to the Washington Light Infantry, Washington Volunteers, German Fusiliers, and Hamburg Volunteers, of South Carolina, who were engaged in the Florida war, and were discharged before the expiration of one month from the commencement of their term of service; and that the accompanying papers be and are hereby referred to said committee.

Mr. KING, of New York, objected; and the resolution was not received.

THE TREASURY ESTIMATES—THE DELAY IN PRINTING.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a matter to the consideration of the House, and I will only occupy a few moments time in doing so. It is known that the estimates from the Treasury Department are required by law to be laid upon our tables at the meeting of Congress. Two weeks of the session have now elapsed, and those estimates are not to be had. I do not undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, where the fault is; but it is very evident that there is a serious obstruction to the dispatch of the public business of the country, which will require the action of this House in some shape or other. I had intended on to-morrow—not supposing the House would adjourn over until Monday—to move a resolution upon that subject. I desire now merely to bring the subject to the attention of the House. On Monday I shall move some resolution, by which we will be enabled to get at the difficulty, and have it removed, if possible.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the House, that the estimates required by law have been in the hands of the public printer of this House, who holds the public printing by contract under law, for some time.

Mr. HOUSTON. How long?

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot state the exact time, but for some considerable time. The Secretary of the Treasury has complied thoroughly with the requisitions of the law, and whatever the fault, or wherever it may be, it certainly is not on his hands. Nor is it the fault of his department. I do not understand the gentleman from Alabama as making any insinuation that the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law. The estimates, I understand, have to come here printed, and be laid upon the tables of members; and as the Secretary of the Treasury was not the printer, it was not in his power to do more than to lay the estimates before the public printer. And if he has not complied with the requisitions of his contract, the fault is on his hands, and not those of the Secretary.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not intend to convey an insinuation against the Secretary of the Treasury; for I could not know, except it might be privately, where the fault was. In the discharge of my official duties here, acting in the capacity in which I am, it is proper for me to bring this subject before the House. If it be not the fault of the Secretary of the Treasury—and I do not pretend to say it is—it is equally a matter that addresses itself to the sound discretion of the House, for its prompt action at some early day. I have accomplished, Mr. Speaker, all I intended to do to-day.

On motion by Mr. HALL, the House adjourned.

Mr. BRIGHT, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution, repealing the joint resolution approved March 3, 1845, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever any State shall have been, or may be, in default for the payment of interest or principal on investment in its stocks or bonds, held by the United States in trust, to retain certain moneys to which such State is entitled; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Sidney S. Alcott, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, reported an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said report and amendment; and on concurrence therewith, it was Ordered, That 10,000 additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, be printed for the use of the Senate; and that 5,000 copies thereof be for the use of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

MOTIONS TO PRINT.

Mr. FISH moved that the bill formerly introduced by him, to establish a Mint of the United States in the city of New York, be printed, and stated that he made the motion at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, moved that the bill formerly introduced by him, for the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. UNDERWOOD, on the 11th instant, was taken up for consideration and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency, and probable cost, of straightening, grading, and paving Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth street west to Georgetown; the erection of a permanent bridge across Rock Creek, from the termination of Pennsylvania avenue, to intersect with Georgetown; the building of a sewer of suitable dimensions for draining Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth to Twentieth streets west; the extension of gas lights along the line of Pennsylvania avenue from Seventeenth street west to Georgetown; an increase of the Auxiliary Guard, under a new system of organization, sufficient to make them an efficient body; of supplying the city with pure water from the Great Falls of the Potomac; and the extension of a line of gas lights from the bridge addressed to High street in Georgetown, and thence along said street to its western termination.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHIELDS, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, and introduce him to the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS moved to lay it on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY LAND WARRANTS.

A bill from the House of Representatives, enacting that the act passed 28th September, 1850, granting bounty land warrants to officers, musicians, and privates, of the American Army since the year 1790, be so construed as to authorize the transfer of said warrants, was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER offered an amendment, which was received informally.

STEAMSHIP PROMETHEUS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. CASS on the 9th instant, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any information the Executive may have received respecting the firing into and seizure of the American steamship Prometheus by a British vessel of war in November last, near Grey Town, on the Mosquito Coast; and also what measures have been taken by the Executive to ascertain the state of the facts and to vindicate the honor of the country.

Mr. CASS said: Mr. President, I do not suppose that this resolution will meet with any opposition, and I rise principally to say that I know nothing of the facts of this case, except what is stated in the public letter of the captain of the steamship which was attacked and captured. It appears by his statement, that a wanton outrage was committed by a British vessel of war upon the flag of the United States, which calls for speedy explanation and redress.

I do not understand from the statement precisely where this aggression took place, whether within any territorial jurisdiction as defined by the laws of nations, or upon the high seas, beyond its reach. In either event it was no less insulting than it was indefensible. If within the jurisdiction of the Indian chief, called the Mosquito King, England, before she approves the act, must disavow her own treaty obligations, because she has stipulated with us that she will not assume or exercise dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America. If the seizure was made upon the high seas, it involves considerations of the gravest character, affecting alike our honor and our interest.

When reports of such flagrant violations of our rights reach us, we cannot act with too much promptitude. Let us show to the nations of the earth, that the American Congress watches with jealous solicitude the conduct of other Powers towards our vessels, as well upon the broad ocean, as in the most secluded place to which the energy and enterprise of our citizens may conduct them. While England, in her dreams of universal maritime sovereignty, aspires to exercise a surveillance over all the navigable waters that surround the globe, it is our duty to exercise a surveillance over our own flag, and to guard it with the utmost power of the country from the desecration of foreign violence, so that wherever it floats, it may announce, that it is the ensign of a jealous Republic, ever ready to protect all the rights of its citizens within the law of nations, and where protection fails, to avenge them.

Mr. President, much of the infancy of our Government was passed in arguing the question of our maritime rights against the most outrageous claims ever urged by cupidity and ambition, as was yesterday stated by the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Stockton] in language equally eloquent and true. I trust its maturity will be passed in a very different manner—in defending and enforcing them, when necessary, not with the pen, but with the iron hand. The argument was long since exhausted, under the administrations of Washington and Jefferson and Madison; or rather, the true principles were stated with great force and knowledge; for argument against these positions there was none. Those statesmen maintained the doctrine, that in time of peace no power on earth has the right to board and search an American vessel for any purpose whatever, and that in time of war a belligerent power has the right to board a neutral ship solely for the purpose of ascertaining her real national character, which, having ascertained, the cruiser must depart peaceably, without touching seamen or cargo. And this doctrine of the inviolability of our flag, should be a cardinal principle in our policy, to be adhered to with unyielding tenacity in all our vicissitudes, whether of prosperity or adversity. The soil of the Republic and the flag of the Republic should be equally sacred, and the violation of either equally avenged. And I trust, that in all time to come, the boarding and search of an American ship upon the great highway of nations, where the proceedings of the officer are approved by his Government, except in a State of hostilities, as a belligerent right, merely to ascertain her national character, will be considered as an act of war, to be met by the whole power of the country, with an energy and unanimity as great as would an invading force crossing our boundary.

I observe among the executive papers, laid before us, in relation to the Cuban expedition, that pretensions are advanced by the British and French Governments, which bring up this claim to search our vessels in a new form. The principle has assumed many phases, and is destined to assume many more, before its final abandonment. The last comes in the guise of a right to protect the Government of Cuba, and to exercise a preventive policy over the neighboring seas, by stopping and searching vessels bearing our flag, and navigated by our citizens. We are not told whether the engagement for this purpose between France and England is a temporary diplomatic arrangement, or whether it is a permanent guarantee, making part of a secret treaty. Be this as it may, we want no such ministerial officers to meddle with us. When our laws are violated, we are quite able to punish the offenders; and even when unforeseen accidents occur to prevent punishment, as sometimes will happen both here and everywhere else, we do not mean to invoke, and I trust we do not mean to permit, either France or England, or even France and England, to assume to be sheriffs and judges, and to take American citizens from the decks of American vessels, and from the jurisdiction of American tribunals, and punish them at their own discretion. "All our Government contends for," said the London Times, in 1842, on the subject of the right of search, "is the mere right to act as constables in boarding suspicious vessels bearing the American flag." A modest claim, and modestly urged, especially with the admission made by the same powerful but reckless journal, that in the practical enforcement of the claim to search, "the searching party, 'being from the nature of the case the strongest, and moreover, ordinarily speaking, persons of summary habits, were apt to be somewhat arbitrary in their judgments of who was American and who was English; when they doubted they took the trick.'" Memorable words, never to be forgotten by the American people or by their Government!

American citizens offending against our laws are responsible to our tribunals, and to no other earthly jurisdiction, except in the case of piracy, which by universal consent is a crime against all civilized nations, and may be punished by either of them. If indeed adventurers from our own country engage in an unlawful expedition against any other, they are of course liable to the consequences of their acts—punishment by the Government injured, when taken in the attempt. But this is far different from the voluntary interposition of other Powers to watch the high seas, under a pretension which cannot be carried into effect, without assuming as its corollary the right to search every vessel, which may make her appearance upon the Gulf of Mexico, or indeed along our coast, wherever these protecting powers may choose to exercise this new jurisdiction. For the claim to prevent vessels of a certain character from approaching Cuba, includes of course the claim to examine all vessels found within the tubod region, in order to ascertain whether they come within the condemned class; whether in fact the trick may not be taken, by virtue of a little well-timed doubt. Or, in other words, this doctrine, if established, would establish the full right of search at all times upon waters of the ocean, whose free navigation is as essential to the United States as is that of the English Channel to England, and would give to two great maritime Powers the control of the Gulf of Mexico and of the mouth of the Mississippi. Lord Palmerston, indeed, assures us that our commerce shall not be interrupted. Cold comfort this! We had rather depend upon our own rights and power, than upon his moderation or that of his country.

"Timeo Danaos" is a wise caution in political affairs, when counsel is proffered by those who are not with us, nor of us. We know the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is not easily turned from his purpose. He has stamped his character as a bold statesman, if not a circumspect one, upon the history of the foreign intercourse of his country; and if he has not always scrupulously regarded the rights of other nations, he has kept a steady eye upon the interest of his own. He undertook to convince us a few years since, that because England had formed a treaty with some of the European continental Powers for the suppression of the slave trade, she had, therefore, a right to search our vessels, in order to carry these engagements into effect. And now, because France and England have constituted themselves the guardians of the Spanish Government in Cuba, therefore their cruisers are at liberty to violate the American flag in seas coterminous with our own coasts, and which are navigated by a large portion of our mercantile marine. The former effort failed, and this will fail, as will the others, in whatever fruitful brain they may originate, which are destined to follow.

I must express my gratification, in looking over the papers, at the ground taken by Mr. Crittenden in his communications with the French and British Ministers. He has laid down the true doctrine, the doctrine for which we have always contended; and I trust the Administration will firmly adhere to it. They will meet, I am sure, with the general concurrence of the country. This is precisely one of those questions before which party disputes should be hushed, and which appeal to the hearts of the whole American people. The resolution was adopted.

RECEPTION OF KOSSUTH.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution of welcome to Kossuth.

Mr. HALE. I desire to say a single word of explanation. The honorable Senator from Georgia, not now in his seat, [Mr. BERRIEN,] who has manifested some interest in the discussion of this resolution, has been called from the city by sickness in his family. On a personal appeal made by him to me in view of that fact, I have concluded to pair off with him in regard to this resolution. I make this explanation as due to him. I shall therefore decline voting on the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. I rise for the purpose of saying, that although, according to the usage of the Senate, I am now entitled to the floor, for the purpose of discussing this question, yet an honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] having intimated to me that he desires to address some remarks to the Senate, and that, on account of the state of his health, he may not be able to remain within the Chamber so as to be able to submit his views to the Senate and the country at a later hour in the day, I have very cheerfully agreed that he should have the opportunity of presenting those views now.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I design to vote on this resolution, and ask the indulgence of the Senate while I state the reasons which govern the vote that I shall give. As becomes a new member of this body, I have listened carefully to the remarks of honorable Senators opposed to the resolution, with a mind unbiased, and anxious only to ascertain the course which wisdom and the dictates of a sound policy prescribe. This resolution is opposed by honorable Senators, whose negative, apart from any argument, carries with it a moral influence which this country well understands, and which no Senator better appreciates than myself; and in differing from them on this occasion, as it is my misfortune to do, it is no less respectful to them than due to myself, that I should express something more than a mere negative vote.

The objects of both resolutions, as I understand them—the resolution of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] and that of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD]—are identical; and the motives which influence the support of one are equally applicable to the other; and I am free to say that I am prepared to vote for either. The object of the resolution is to extend to Kossuth an honor which, however it may be regarded by other Senators, I contemplate as the highest distinction of the age—a distinction, sir, infinitely above all the gorgeous triumphal spectacles which Rome ever conceded to her conquerors in the palmiest days of the Republic—a distinction emanating from a council of sovereigns—a distinction which derives both grace and gravity from its association with the name of Lafayette. I would ask, Is the man whom it is proposed thus to greet worthy of this rare and remarkable honor? I will not, at this inauspicious moment, stay to question all that his most ardent admirers concede to him. I will not here question his former views, plans, or policy with reference to his country's wrongs. I will not now, by a hypercritical investigation, seek an excuse for withholding from his present position—from his present heaven-born hope for freedom to Hungary—that sympathy, that respect which his former course, personal or political, whatever it may have been, might possibly have precluded.

In voting for this resolution, I do not regard Louis Kossuth as a man whose every word and deed are to be subjected—as they have been here to some extent—to an inquisitorial examination; an examination from which frail humanity, whatever form it take, can never emerge unscathed. But, in yielding him this respect, I regard him as the impersonation, the embodiment of the principles of civil and religious liberty among the millions of Europe. I regard him as a man followed to our shores by the eyes of the petty tyrants of every quarter of Europe, and as the man who has concentrated upon himself the gaze of the struggling millions of the earth, who are regarding him at this moment as the forlorn hope of freedom.

By both parties, by the oppressors and the oppressed, his advent here, the first breath he drew upon our soil, must be regarded as fraught with probabilities the most momentous; and every patriot of Europe, from the Rhine to the distant mountains of Transylvania, who has traced in our country the mighty results of the first steps of the Pilgrims upon this continent, doubtless puts up his prayer to Heaven that the footsteps of Kossuth may also lead to country, to freedom, and to home.

Now, sir, I am prepared to honor this man; I am prepared to sympathize with him, because he, in the centre of the despotism of ages and surrounded by the mighty moral and physical influences of time-honored monarchies, had the sagacity to direct his attention to our form of government, and the courage to lead his people by our example. Principles, sir, are more mighty in the change of empires than all the armed intervention that ever unfurled a flag. Kossuth struggled for a principle which we venerate—the principle of self-government, as I understand it,—and, struggling, failed. But his very failure in such a cause entitles him as fully to our sympathy and respect as any degree of success could possibly have done.

I feel called upon to say, that in supporting this resolution I am not governed by the question whether Kossuth be or be not the guest of the nation, or whether he was or was not invited to our country by the action of Congress. But, though the solution of this question, about which honorable Senators so widely differ, is regarded by me as unimportant, I am free to confess that I can perceive, neither in the joint resolution of Congress, nor in any act of any department of our Government, nothing which confers upon him this character, or justifies his friends in placing him in this attitude. No fair construction of language, in my judgment, can possibly regard the joint resolution of Congress as an invitation to our country. The utmost that was ever contemplated by this Government was to afford him and his companions in arms, prisoners in Turkey, a means of reaching the United States, if they should desire to emigrate here. No, sir; my sympathy is yielded regardless of any such consideration.

I believe that there is no disposition on the part of Senators who have spoken against this resolution to withhold from Kossuth their respect and sympathy. On the contrary, every Senator whom I have heard express an opinion seems to regard him as the Man of the Age. I will not stop to inquire whether adulation of this character be merited or well-founded. But while yielding him this personal tribute, the feeling with those who oppose this resolution seems to be, that if it shall pass it will be a species of intervention, or, at least, that it may lead to intervention and entangling alliances in the affairs of Europe. Now, differing in toto, as I do, from those honorable Senators, I must nevertheless respect the motive which dictates their opposition; and I am free to confess, that if I could regard it in this light—if I could look at it as intervention in the affairs of Europe, or as leading to such intervention, however slight it might be, it would never receive my vote.

But it is impossible to regard this simple resolution as intervention. I have listened to Senators who have spoken upon the other side of the question, to discover some argument on the subject to show that the expression of sympathy is intervention. But I have failed to discover any. Had I been convinced that it was intervention, the resolution should certainly not receive my support. I cannot regard it as even a discourtesy or as calculated justly to offend any power of Europe. Still I have no doubt but offence will be taken in certain quarters, if the resolution shall pass. It will be borne upon the wings of a thousand winds, and every petty tyrant, from the Rhine to the Volga, will be made to understand that the sympathies and prayers of the American people on this broad continent are with the masses; and the masses themselves will feel their hearts swelling with new hopes, their arms strengthened with new vigor; and it is for this very reason that I am prepared to support it.

If we may justly welcome Kossuth to our soil—if we could place a national ship at his disposal to bring him here—if we can express our sympathies in his past sufferings, and our ardent hope for his brilliant future,—if we can do this on our own soil, in our own family circle of States, and under the broad shadow of our flag, what care we for any misinterpretation that may be put upon our conduct, if the conduct be correct in itself? It is our honor we have in charge, and not the opinions of despots in any part of Europe. Every act that we may do upon the subject of freedom, in any part of the globe, must be offensive to despotism. Our forms of government are antagonistic, and the progress of one leads to the destruction of the other. Our very birth was an offence to despotism. It grew out of it, and every step which we have taken in our political existence, has been but an augmentation of it. Every town, hamlet, and village in our country; every spot of earth consecrated by our flag; every star added to our Union, is not only an offence, but an attack, a direct attack, upon despotism; and our glorious country itself, towering, as it does, above the nations of the earth, and within the moral vision of all mankind, is a monument, I verily believe a monument designed by the Almighty, which tells as plainly as the writing upon the wall, that the days of despotism are numbered. Yes, sir, I believe our country is a monument permitted by Heaven to foretell the destruction of despotism; and that it has become a mere question of time.

But I cannot believe for a single moment that the honorable Senators who oppose this resolution are actuated by any consideration as to what the despots of Europe, or any Power of earth, may think of their conduct. No, sir; I am not to be told that any member of this body would deviate the thousandth part of a hair from any course which his judgment and patriotism would dictate, through fear of any of the consequences which might arise in that quarter. If any such cowardly instincts could find their way into these halls, the associations by which we are surrounded, the high vocation we pursue would make a hero of the coward, in an instant. But the opposition springs from the idea, that if this is not intervention per se, it may lead to it. As regards the abstract subject of intervention, I entirely concur with the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the resolution. I believe if we intervene at all, it must be morally, not physically. And in this light our intervention has been going on for years, and its march is mighty at this very moment. By bringing from Europe her down-trodden thousands; by offering to the martyrs of civil and religious liberty in the Old World a country and a home; by admitting them to the rights of citizenship before they speak our language; by bestowing upon them our public lands and throwing around them the protection of equal laws, liberties, and institutions, I believe we are doing more for the amelioration of man's condition, more for the development of human intellect, power and happiness, than all the armed intervention in the world could ever do.

But, sir, a species of amicable intervention has been alluded to. Protests have been spoken of by honorable Senators to whom it has always been my pleasure to look for instruction on that as on all other points of international law. And I say with all frankness now—though still open to conviction—that I cannot regard a protest as the result, or the evidence, of any amicable intervention. Neither do I agree with my honorable friends as to the policy, the wisdom, or the expediency of protesting against the conduct of any despotic power of Europe. The protest spoken of would, in my judgment, be an intervention, and an intervention equally novel and dangerous; because I cannot, in my mind, get rid of the absurdity of assuming a position by protest which we had not predetermined to maintain in the only manner which could possibly prove effectual among the nations of Europe. Our policy has been that of non-intervention; and when we make a protest, it goes forth accompanied by a tacit declaration of non-intervention as the policy of the land, unless contradicted by an unheard-of exception. As to its expediency, I would remind honorable Senators, who maintain this idea of protest, that but yesterday, as it were, we were engaged in a contest upon this continent, and I would ask them what would have been the result, if, in the midst of that contest with Mexico, we had heard, some cool morning, that the Czar of Russia, from his distant throne, had sent his protest to the State Department against our interference in the affairs of Mexico? What would have been the result? One universal shout of defiance would have ascended from the Kennebeck to the Rio Grande. It would have been regarded by men of all parties, and all shades of opinion, as an intentional insult, and as such would it have been treated.

Bur, sir, as I have said, I do not see intervention in this proposition, and shall therefore vote for it. If, unhappily, those nations with which it is our duty as well as our interest, to cultivate amicable relations, should so construe it, the illusion would be dispelled by a firm adherence to the principle which has always governed us—the principle of non-intervention. Senators have talked as if the hour might speedily arrive when we may be called upon to abandon this time-honored principle. They have said not that it will come, but that it may be close at hand. Sir, I regret to hear it. I shall regret to see the time when we shall be called upon to intervene, directly or indirectly, in the political affairs of Europe. It has been asked, too, by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] Is this firm adherence to one established principle, progress? I reply that the abandonment of it would not be progress. In my opinion it would be a step backwards. I profess, sir, to be a man of progress. I profess an abiding belief in the progressive development, under the immediate providence of God, of the intellect, power, and happiness of man; and, professing this, I say, Heaven forbid that we should ever be called upon to abandon the principle of non-intervention. Principles are eternal; and I would have this, especially, as eternal, as immovable as the stars of heaven by whose fixed and unchanging light we guide and regulate our progress.

I have also heard the idea thrown out that we have a mission, a political mission to perform. In my humble judgment, sir, if we have such a mission, we must look for the field of its exercise Southward, not Eastward. If it be our "manifest destiny" to regenerate mankind, I humbly conceive that we should continue as we have begun—take one continent at a time. Senators have indulged in a wide field of remark upon this subject; and as if to show our power, should we be led, by intervention, to cope with the Powers of Europe, it has been said by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] and, said, too in tones which will rouse the blood in the heart of every American, tones which found an echo in the breast of every man in this Chamber, that our old mother herself, were she to enter into a contest with us, would find that there are blows to be received as well as blows to be given. And in illustrating his idea of her form of government, he denied her some things, which I apprehend no Senator will be more willing to concede to her than himself. I am not about to become the eulogist of Britain, her government, or her so-called, or rather mis-called, Constitution. It is unnecessary. I need not point to her thousand sources of greatness and glory, for I see around me Senators who are its living monuments. I see around me honorable Senators who cannot trace back their blood a hundred years without running into some of her purest fountains. But discarding this, and all minor claims to our admiration and respect, we should never forget to whom we are indebted for the language of Shakspeare and the laws of our land; for the writ of habeas corpus, for trial by jury, and for the very principles of civil government. And, sir, were we to divest ourselves to-day of everything we owe to Britain—of law, language, literature, and morals—we would hardly have anything with which to set up for ourselves.

But that is not the question. I agree with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] that this is a great national act of courtesy; that as such it should be performed gracefully for our own sakes, or not performed at all; and that it should not be burdened with conditions which are tantamount to a declaration to the recipient that he must not abuse our hospitality. He has doubtless come to these shores under a hope—yea, more than a hope, under a conviction—that he can obtain governmental and substantial aid for himself and his country. I confess that I believe so; because I must be blind to the ordinary use of language, which he knows so well how to use, if I did not come to that conclusion from his own declarations. But it is an error which a month's residence in our country will dispel. We may well conceive what is the hope and wish of a man whose whole being is concentrated in one great and noble idea—the freedom of his country. Do not let us, while breathing words of welcome, thrust this rebuke of his error prematurely and unhandsomely upon him. The wild Arab receives not the guest whom accident sends to his tent with such unmannerly hospitality.

The Senator from New Hampshire's idea [Mr. HALE] of greeting a man cordially, if you greet him at all—of grasping his hand with a truthful pressure, regardless of his peculiar idiosyncrasies—meets my assent; and, to use the strongest figure in my power, I will say to that honorable Senator, that even he, should he ever find himself beneath the roof-tree of any gentleman in the State which I have the honor to represent, his welcome will be dictated by the good old-fashioned rules of Southern hospitality, regardless of his peculiar idiosyncrasies. My voice admonishes me, sir, of my inability to continue these remarks, in which my only aim is to state briefly and frankly wherein I do not concur with my friends on this side of the Chamber, and the views which influence my support of this resolution.

I hold, sir, that before we are called upon to forbear the expression of feelings in the manner proposed, upon the ground that such an expression will be a departure from the settled policy of our country, argument and not declamation should be invoked to show it to be intervention; and I trust, sir, that opposition to the passage of the resolution will not be persisted in unless honorable Senators can sustain this point.

Mr. BADGER. When the Congress of the United States is called upon to award a high honor—an honor, according to the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] who has just taken his seat, higher than triumphs which Rome, in her palmiest days, ever awarded to her conquering sons—it is certainly but reasonable to expect that the grounds should be clear and manifest upon which such a demand is made. In the past history of this country we have had but one example of such an honor having been awarded by the Congress of the United States. And surely, without troubling ourselves with any investigation of what is supposed to be the musty doctrine of precedent, we have a right to expect that gentlemen who ask this at our hands shall assign the reasons why we should now, for the second time, offer the contemplated honor to the individual who is named in this resolution. Gentlemen have felt that there was an obligation upon them to produce the reasons of this proceeding. My friend from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who deemed it strange and unreasonable that this resolution should provoke the least discussion, that gentleman himself, who seemed to suppose that any discussion of it could be accounted for only by the supposition that this Senate would always discuss any proposition—even he, with the sentence of censure upon all previous discussion upon his lips, went forward in the pursuit of that which he condemns in others, and occupied the Senate with a speech—to which I listened, of course, with pleasure, as I always do to whatever falls from that distinguished gentleman—which occupied no inconsiderable portion of yesterday's sitting. He delivered a speech, of which I will say it brought no new topic before the American Senate, upon this subject. It urged no new argument, it produced no new statement, it was made in reply to no new antagonist who had appeared in the debate. It was a reiteration for the fourth, fifth, or sixth time, of arguments—I will not say which had been as well expressed—into the arena of such criticism as that I dare not venture—but which had certainly been well and forcibly expressed by others. Now, sir, knowing, as I do, that that honorable Senator, when he speaks in this Chamber, always speaks to this body; that he seeks to enlighten and to guide our opinions, and that he has no ulterior objects and purposes before him, I have felt by these remarks of his the strongest possible conviction fixed upon my mind that the friends of this resolution thought it necessary to assign some reasons for its adoption. And I must say, that when I listened to that honorable Senator, and when I listened to some other Senators—my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] in particular—I have felt another conviction fastened upon my mind—that while they were doubly impressed with the extreme necessity of producing reasons, they found it no easy task to discover any to produce.

Mr. President, I wish to say, in the commencement of what I have to offer to the Senate upon this subject, that if discussion has been produced here on this resolution, it is not to be charged to those of us who oppose its adoption. When the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SAWARD,] in discharge of the high duty which he thought was imposed upon him, thought proper to introduce this resolution, he accompanied its introduction with a long, elaborate, and soul-stirring appeal, which was calculated to arouse our feelings, to excite our passions, and for the moment to suspend the calm exercise of our judgments. When, after this storm of passion had subsided, we were at length allowed to exercise our own judgments, unimpeded by the mystic visions of grandeur and terror and glory, with which impassioned eloquence had surrounded us—when we were able once more to resume the exercise of a calm understanding, and to take, in the language of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] a dispassionate view of this subject, was it to be expected that, entertaining different opinions from others, we could, in justice to ourselves and what we believe to be the true interest of the country, fail to assign our reasons to the Senate? Were we not called upon, by considerations of high respect for the honorable and distinguished Senator from whom this resolution proceeded, as well as for the honorable and distinguished gentlemen who supported this resolution with their eloquence and their arguments,—were we not bound, independent of all other considerations, by due respect for them, to say why we could not go with them when it is always a matter of such deep-felt reluctance to part from them?

Mr. President, I think it is out of place to say that it is a waste of time to subject this resolution to discussion. It is a question which ought to be discussed; its intrinsic merits demand it. The circumstances which surround it in this Chamber and beyond these walls enforce the necessity and the propriety of it; and if we may drop from the high and solemn topics which have been gathered around the reception of Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity, which have been so brilliantly spread before us—arching the heavens, spangling the firmament, and I know not what other, magnificent and startling figures—and look at some of the mundane operations which are immediately before us in the course of our political future soon to be history,—when we consider certain disposals of certain eminent political offices which in a short time are to be made by the American people, we find an additional reason. Why, if we can allow ourselves to subside from the torrent of excited feelings into which we have been plunged, we should present before the American people what we think is the calm and dispassionate and deliberate common-sense view of the subject before the Senate.

I agree with what was said by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who addressed the Senate a few days ago on this subject, that this is a case which requires statement rather than argument; and I would add to his proposition, that it requires argument rather than declamation, and proof of the propriety of adopting this course rather than, I will not say unmeaning (for nothing that is spoken on this floor is ever unmeaning) defiance of foreign Powers, and the large and expansive declarations of American power and prowess, which we have heard, and of our capacity to contend with a world in arms. Let us look at this question as it is presented to us upon its intrinsic merits. What is it? As I have said, gentlemen have admitted (as is plain, whether admitted or not) that they are to assign some reasons why this resolution should be adopted. The resolution proposes to bid, in the name of the American people, Louis Kossuth welcome to our shores. Several reasons have been assigned why we should adopt this course. I proceed to offer some remarks upon them.

It is said, in the first place, that by the joint resolution adopted at the last session of Congress, we have taken the initiatory step which requires us, in point of consistency and honor, to follow it up with what is now proposed. That I deny. I know no method by which we can ascertain what we did at the last session of Congress, and to what, therefore, we may consider ourselves as properly obliged as a consequence of it, than by looking at the language of the resolution. My honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. CASS] said that he scouted the idea of applying philology to this investigation. Scout the idea of applying philological criticism, the rule by which we ascertain the meaning of language, to the question of the interpretation of language! Why, my honorable friend must have a very singular idea of the office and purpose of philology. He seems to have made a similar mistake in reference to that science which was made by a very respectable but a rather testy old gentleman of my acquaintance with regard to the science of arithmetic, or numbers, who became extremely offended when waggishly told by a young man sitting at the breakfast table with him, pointing to a plate containing three biscuits, "Mr. R., you cannot tell how many biscuits there are in that plate without counting them." "What! sir," says he, "do you take me for a fool, that I cannot tell that there are three biscuits in that plate without counting them?" He rejected the idea that computation and arithmetic were necessary to ascertain numbers, if the number of particulars were small. I know that my honorable friend did not mean that; but why did he use that high term? Why did he go into this Anglicized Greek word, of which many of our constituents at home know nothing, and who would naturally imagine, without an explanation, that those of us who are opposed to the resolution had brought some new and strange and barbarous machinery of interpretation to bear—brought, perhaps, from some of those European despotisms, and totally unknown to our country? Why, we cannot ascertain the meaning of anything which depends upon words, without the application of the rules of philology to it.

But did my friend mean to imply that there was any disposition to what is called hypercriticism; that is, to bring to the construction of this resolution a reluctant disposition to understand its meaning, and a disposition to cavil with it? Why, if he did, as was justly said by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] there is not the shadow of a foundation for the suggestion. Yet I may be permitted to say, that although I would not feel myself justified in applying to an ordinary resolution or act of Congress any particular strictures of interpretation; though I am not disposed to apply it to this, there would be nothing very unreasonable in such a process, when we recollect from whom the joint resolution proceeded. It came from my honorable friend from Mississippi, [Mr. FOOTE,] known to us all for his extreme exactness in the use of language, and, therefore, it may well stand out as an exception from the general legislation of this body, and we have a right to treat it with more closeness of examination, and more severity of criticism than a resolution proceeding from another person. We all know that the honorable Senator has a place in what he writes for every word; and, he will excuse me for saying, that we also know that he has a word for every place. It is impossible for us, according to my judgment, if I understand the English language, as it is used North and South, that there can be any mistake about the understanding of Congress at the time the resolution was adopted. It says:

Whereas the people of the United States sincerely sympathize with the Hungarian exiles, Kossuth and his associates, and fully appreciate the magnanimous conduct of the Turkish Government in receiving and treating these noble exiles with kindness and hospitality; and if it be the wish of these exiles to emigrate to the United States, and the will of the Sultan to permit them to leave his dominions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be and he hereby is requested to authorize the employment of some one of the public vessels which may now be cruising in the Mediterranean to receive and convey to the United States the said Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity.

The preamble of that resolution asserts, in the first place, a fact; and then it alleges a contingency; upon which contingency, and upon which alone, the particular direction of the resolution is founded and is to take effect. The fact affirmed is the sympathy of the American people for those exiles, and their estimate of the noble conduct of the Turkish Government in giving them a refuge. The contingency is, whether or not these exiles desire to emigrate to the United States. If they desire to emigrate, the President is requested to authorize the use of one of our ships cruising upon the Mediterranean sea to bring them to the United States. And if they did not mean to emigrate, it was not the intention of Congress that the President should furnish them with a national ship. I presume that, without any particular dexterity in this dark, barbarous Greek-derived science of philology, we have a pretty tolerable understanding in this country of what is meant by an emigrant and emigration. If an English or a French gentleman comes over to this country to visit it; to look at its railroads, its steamboats, its harbors; to contemplate its government and the condition of its people, we do not call him an emigrant. When we speak of emigrant ships we think we have a clear and distinct meaning attached to the term. An emigrant is a man who leaves Europe; who comes to our shores with a view of making our country his home; who comes to settle amidst us and become one of our people; and to enjoy the privileges and protection which our laws give him; and ultimately, in due time, and at no very distant day, to be allowed to participate equally in all the municipal privileges conferred by the Constitution upon the citizen. Then to whom did this resolution apply? It applied to Kossuth and his companions in captivity, desiring to emigrate to this country and to make it their home. It was intended to afford them facilities in a public ship, in order that they might become domiciled here. That is the plain, unmistakable meaning of the law.

Now, besides the meaning of it as apparent from its terms, do we not all know that that is the way in which we understood it? We took it for granted—the outbreak in Hungary having been crushed by the power of the Czar added to that of the Emperor—the country being restored to its original condition of subjection, but stripped of its privileges—that Kossuth, languishing in a Turkish prison, was desirous to come to this country, and enjoy with us a common freedom, partake of the protection of our laws, and do what he could not do in Europe—live a peaceful and happy life, and die a Christian and quiet death. To this state of things it applied, and this was all. It was not a resolution directly for the benefit of Kossuth, the late Governor of Hungary, by way of doing him an honor in the character which he had then lately sustained. It was not a resolution that bears upon its face the slightest allusion to the fact, that, for the time, he had been possessed of and exercised sovereign power in the direction of this contest. It was addressed to Louis Kossuth as an exile in captivity, seeking to escape from the inauspicious condition of European coercion, to place himself, as a resident and a denizen, upon our shores. No man can successfully deny this. There was a reason why Congress should have desired the President to transport Kossuth and his associates in captivity here in a public ship, which has never heretofore occurred in the case of any other person desiring to emigrate. We all know that the Emperor of Austria considered his entertainment in Turkey an offence to him. We all know he demanded that Kossuth should be expelled from Turkey by the authority of the Sultan. We all know that he sought to seize him and bring him within his jurisdiction and authority, to subject him to such punishment as he might deem suitable to the occasion. It was, therefore, for that reason, important that when the Sultan gave permission to Kossuth and his associates to leave his dominions, if they desired to emigrate to the United States, we should put them under the protection of our flag, which would effectually prevent him from being seized by the power of Austria.

This being the state of the case, I desire to know upon what authority gentlemen say, that by that resolution we have invited Kossuth to our shores—have made him the guest of the nation? Is there a word in that resolution expressive of invitation? Is there a word in it that declares that the people of the United States desire that he should come to our shores as a guest? The difficulty interposed by the word "if" was to be solved before this public ship was to be placed at his disposal, or used for his service, and there is not a word in the resolution which intimates that the United States cared whether or not he decided to come. It announced nothing but this: This man was in captivity; we understood he wanted to come to our country. We knew that in the existing state of things, if he left Turkey without being put aboard an American ship, he might not be permitted to exercise his free wish to come. Therefore we tendered him the opportunity to come under the national flag of this country. That is the whole of it. He was not invited guest of the nation,—not a whit more an invited guest of the nation than the humblest emigrant that leaves the shores of Europe and finds himself in the port of New York. If the fact of placing that ship at his control, or rather of charging that ship with the duty of bringing Kossuth and his companions to our shores; if the fact that he was brought to our shores in that ship would have constituted him the guest of the nation, he did not come in that capacity. He left that vessel at Gibraltar, and made an excursion to England. He left his associates to come under our flag without him, and he came here afterwards in a private packet. How, then, is he to be distinguished in the particular to which I am referring from any other emigrant who seeks our shores? He can in no way be distinguished. Other men who come here are more humble. They may not have achieved the name which he has acquired. They may leave a transient impression in the little circle which surrounds them, and then be forgotten, while his name may remain and be perpetuated by history to succeeding generations; but so far as the claims of an emigrant may extend—so far as a generous desire to give our hospitality to those who come—so far as a wish to offer a refuge to the persecuted, the oppressed, the unhappy, extends, Louis Kossuth stands no particle higher than the meanest and humblest down-trodden individual of Europe who ever reached our shores. Indeed, so far as claims to our sympathy are concerned, surely to a generous mind there are particular reasons why this sympathy should be opened and shown forth more towards the lowly and the humble. I say, then, that there being nothing in the original resolution but a simple proposition to bring to this country one who was supposed to be desirous of emigrating here, there is no more reason why we should pass a resolution of welcome towards him than towards those thousands of humble individuals who come here not under a particular resolution, but under general invitation held forth by our Constitution and our laws to the oppressed, the poor, and the humble of every state and clime.

The resolution of the last Congress, then, does not pledge us to this step; but if it did, I ask, how is it possible to resist the conclusion that the amendment offered by my honorable friend from Georgia [Mr. BEATTIE] ought to be attached to the pending resolution? and that the honorable Senator from New York, when he drew it, should have inserted in it the name—not the individual names—but the general name, descriptive of all those persons who are embraced in the original act of Congress which gave rise to those proceedings. The resolution of the last Congress makes no distinction among them. The President is requested to furnish to them all, as Hungarian exiles in captivity, a passage to this country—"to Kossuth and his associates in captivity." What a strange spectacle, then, do we exhibit, when our friends on the other side of the Chamber resolutely refuse to permit the associates of Kossuth to be incorporated in the resolution of welcome to Kossuth! Is it to be construed as a degradation to Kossuth to be put alongside in this resolution of those his associates? If the association be not offensive—if he was willing to keep company with them, to be prisoner with them, to receive their affectionate ministrations and their affectionate sympathies, my opinion is, that, if he has the soul of a man in his bosom, he will resent the idea of having compliments paid to him alone, did we offer to do it. When, during the war of 1812, and during the recent war with Mexico, one of our commanders gained a great victory, and Congress expressed the sense of the nation upon the subject, were the thanks of Congress expressed toward the commander-in-chief, and the officers and soldiers who served under him omitted and forgotten? No, sir; the thanks of Congress were always bestowed upon the commander-in-chief, and, through him, to the officers and soldiers who served under him, and by whose aid and assistance the victory had been achieved. Has it not been always so? We may vote medals to the generals; we may sometimes give additional pay to the soldiers; but the thanks of Congress, the expression of the sense of the country in behalf of those who have served faithfully, and added another leaf to the laurels which crown her brow, have always been voted to all, in whatever situation, who have participated in the gallant deed. And yet here are Mr. Kossuth's associates, not, I suppose, servants—men, I suppose, his equal in the sense in which we understand equality. I presume they are men whom he takes by the hand, whom he does not keep at a distance, compelling them to approach him in the attitude of servile dependence. Yet when Congress is asked to bring Kossuth and these very associates here, the first thing after that, and after they are brought, is, that a resolution is offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] to welcome Kossuth, and turn our backs upon his associates. Sir, if any reason in the world can be assigned for the resolution, it follows as a necessary and indispensable corollary from it, that the amendment should be also adopted. I do not understand this thing. It is not consistent with my notions, and what I believe to be American notions, of equality. We have sent a public ship, or we have authorized the using of a public ship, to bring Kossuth and some twenty or thirty other Hungarians, who have all fought for their country, who have shared a common captivity with him. When we propose to include these men in the resolution of welcome, it is opposed as interfering with the preëminent dignity of the chief. Is that the American idea of equality?

I do not understand a very great deal about this contest. Some of my honorable friends here, who are much better acquainted with the case than I am, have regarded it as a sort of attempt to uphold the Magyar—or Maguire, as some of us call it—superiority of race. Even if that is so, I presume these associates of Kossuth are neither Croats nor Sclavonians, but belong to the privileged race, as well as himself. I do not suppose that Kossuth will feel his dignity insulted if we choose to say to him, We are glad to see you, and are glad also to see the men you have brought with you.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I would ask my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] if he will vote for the resolution in case the amendment he has so much at heart should prevail?

Mr. BADGER. The question need not have been asked by the honorable Senator, because I had answered it already. Allow me to assure the Senator that he places me in no difficulty by asking questions of this kind. I have said, and I repeat, I am opposed to the whole resolution, with or without the amendment. Therefore the Senator did not ask the question in order to be informed. For what purpose he did ask it, he is best able to determine.

Sir, other reasons have been assigned in the course of this discussion. It has been said that we were committed to adopt some such precedent as this, because it was of Executive recommendation. I think, sir, some of the House who consider ourselves pretty good Whigs, were rather twitted by some of our friends on the other side, because we were opposing what they said the President recommended. Permit me to remark, it is no Whig doctrine, that a Whig is bound to support, with or without reason, whatever a Whig President may recommend. If that doctrine obtains among our friends on the other side with regard to a Democratic President, it may be necessary they should urge some special excuse for departing from it in any particular case, while such departure might, without such excuse, be considered a ground of censure, and an intimation that they had stepped off the Democratic platform. But we acknowledge no such doctrine, and therefore it would be a sufficient answer to say, that even if it were the President's recommendation, we do not agree in its propriety, and therefore cannot support it. But the fact is, the President of the United States has recommended no such thing?

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Will my friend allow me a moment of explanation?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. FOOTE. If I was understood as stating that the President of the United States recommended this resolution, I was certainly grossly misunderstood. I stated the simple facts to be, as I shall explain them on this occasion. I wish it to be understood distinctly, that I said this before, that I should never have moved, or thought of moving in this business, but that I received an unexpected, kind, and very complimentary written application from the Secretary of State of the United States, requesting an interview upon this subject; which interview was immediately held. In the course of that interview he brought to my attention, in advance of the President's message being received in this body, the fact that the President would make substantially the recommendation which is to be found in the message. He requested me especially, and in a manner marked with particular earnestness, to introduce, at the earliest possible moment after the commencement of the session, a joint resolution for the purpose of raising a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, to decide, in accordance with the recommendation of the President contained in his message, upon the most expedient mode of affording a national reception to Governor Kossuth. He went further, as I may now state. I dislike to go into these particulars; but really, the allusion of the honorable gentleman makes it necessary for me to do it. He requested me—having a very high respect, as we all have, for that knowledge of parliamentary precedents which distinguishes so highly the Secretary of this body—to go to him immediately. I went to his house without delay, at the instance of the Secretary of State, for the purpose of ascertaining how, in some way consistent with Senatorial usage, such a joint resolution could be introduced and passed, if such a thing should turn out to be practicable, without the necessity of previous notice. I learned from the Secretary that the mode of proceeding thus intimated by the Secretary of State, was not practicable. Therefore I did proceed to give notice, as the Senate recollects.

I will state further, in explanation of my conduct, that I should not have mentioned the name of the Secretary of State at all except upon his express authorization. It appears to me that if a joint committee was raised, the Secretary should himself deliver the address to the Governor of Hungary. I spoke to him to that effect; which he promptly declined, from an unwillingness to do anything which might look like compromising our neutral relations.

If I had known at first that there would have been so much discussion about this delicate subject, as to the responsibility which the Administration have assumed, or intended to assume, I would have been more circumstantial in the first instance. But really I could not anticipate such a course of proceeding. It is true, and the Secretary of State will bear me witness of the fact, that in the course of my interview with him, he went so far into particulars as to refer to the former reception of the Marquis de Lafayette, as affording a proper precedent. So that idea did not originate with this side of the Chamber. He suggested it to me as the proper precedent, and said that in his opinion the best mode would be to bring in Kossuth, without any particular ceremony, to each House, and have him introduced to the President of this body and to the Speaker of the other House, when suitable addresses should be made, in some formal mode, by the presiding officer of each House. That was the idea of the Secretary of State; and concurring with him, I adopted the course which I have pursued.

I wish all to understand, that owing to the delicate character of this affair, I resolved not to enlist in it at all unless I could be authorized by the Secretary of State to say that it was at his instance that I acted, and that he sanctioned the proceeding. I hope that in all I have said, no one will understand me casting censure on any person. I have been very desirous of receiving Kossuth in a manner creditable to the nation, creditable to our national feeling, and in a manner required by the almost unanimous voice of the people. Knowing the feelings of some members of the Administration, I was anxious to give the gentlemen on the other side of the House a fair opportunity of participating in the eclat of the proceedings, and if they have declined it, I think they have made a great mistake, and that it has been one of the most serious political blunders they have ever committed.

Mr. BADGER. I would ask my friend from Mississippi, whether, after having introduced this resolution, at the instance of the Secretary of State, he withdrew it without any conference with that gentleman?

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I withdrew the resolution certainly, without any conference with him. I withdrew it, because I did think honorable gentlemen had not conferred as they might have done with the powers that be. I did consider that I was rather ungraciously treated by some honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House, who seemed to misunderstand my position, and not to afford me that liberal support which they ought to have done, when the proposition was brought forward under such auspices. I withdrew the resolution for the additional reason, that I saw very plainly, that if Governor Kossuth was received on the day when it was originally expected he would be received in New York, it was not at all likely, from the opposition experienced here, provided a similar opposition was presented in the other House, that we should be able to act in time to receive this distinguished stranger in the mode contemplated. I stated these reasons at the time I proposed to withdraw the resolution. I did it, as I stated then, without the least feeling of unkindness or disrespect toward any human being in the world; but with feelings of the most profound mortification, that gentlemen had not acted up to what I had supposed would be their course of conduct.

MR. BADGER. I gave the opportunity to the gentleman from Mississippi with great pleasure to make these statements; because, although he has already spoken several times with reference to this particular point, some misapprehensions have prevailed which this opportunity has enabled him to rectify. But at the time he interposed I was not referring particularly to the introduction of his resolution, under the sanction of the Secretary of State; I was alluding to a remark made by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] that this was a measure recommended by the Executive of the United States in his annual message. So far as that is concerned, it seems to me that no two things can be more clearly and distinctly separate than what is contained on this subject in the President's message and this resolution. The President had been desired by Congress to cause these Hungarian patriots to be brought here in a public ship. He had, in compliance with that request, caused them to be brought in the ship; and they were daily expected at the time the President's message was written. He could say nothing less than he has said. He has simply communicated to Congress the fact that these captives had been brought here according to their request, and he desired them to do what they thought proper under the circumstances. The President does not intimate that he wished one disposition or another to be made of them, or of the subject. Of course he was bound, as President, to inform us in his annual message what he had done in accordance with our desire, and to ask us to make such further disposition of the subject as we thought right.

Again: and now I refer to what my friend from Mississippi has said. It was the desire of the Secretary of State that this resolution should be introduced. As regards his application to the Senator from Mississippi for that purpose, the introduction of the subject and the withdrawal of the resolution, we must keep dates in view in order to give a proper influence to these various transactions. The President's message was prepared and printed, as we all know, before the meeting of Congress. It was in the town in which I lived, before I left there for the seat of Government. Before it was sent to either House of Congress it was in the possession of the postmaster, ready to be delivered when he should receive a telegraphic dispatch authorizing him to do so. Everything, therefore, in the President's message, was prepared, written and printed before the arrival of this gentleman in this country. The resolution, offered by my friend from Mississippi, was, if I recollect aright, introduced on the very first day of the session. It was withdrawn on the Thursday succeeding, being the fourth day of the session, and Kossuth did not arrive in this country until the day afterwards—until Friday. We must bear in mind that Kossuth had been expected to come to this country as an emigrant. It was in that character that a public ship was employed to bring him here. It was in that character he was expected to arrive. It was with reference to that character that the President's message referred to him. It was with reference to the same thing the resolution was proposed to be introduced by the Secretary of State, and that the resolution was introduced. That state of things continued until the resolution was withdrawn. Never, until Kossuth landed upon our shores, did we have any authentic declaration from him of the purpose for which he came here. We may have drawn our conjectures from what he said in his hasty visit to England, but we had no authoritative expression of his purpose in coming, and what he expected to accomplish, until after he landed in this country.

MR. FOOTE, of Mississippi. In justice to the Secretary of State, and to the Administration, I must say that the object of his visit was not spoken of in the interview which I had with Mr. Webster. The reception referred to and recommended by Mr. Webster was based upon our resolution of last session, and he suggested to me the propriety of my moving in the matter, on account of my being, as he knew, the author of the original resolution. I feel bound to say, that if the Secretary of State had supposed that any expectation was entertained by Governor Kossuth that an armed intervention was to take place on the part of the United States in European affairs, I think he would have been one of the last men in the world to have requested me to offer any resolution on the subject. I do not think now that anything of the sort is contemplated in any quarter.

MR. BADGER. I am obliged to my friend from Mississippi for this explicit statement, which he has made with his usual candor. It seems, then, that so far as the action of the Administration is concerned, the President and the Secretary of State both referred to a supposed emigrant coming among us for the purpose of settling here, and making this country his domicile.

MR. FOOTE. If the gentleman understood me as saying that the application was made to me to introduce my resolution this session with a view to providing for the reception of Kossuth as an emigrant, he misunderstood me. I stated no such thing. If the gentleman will refer to the British papers, he will find that Governor Kossuth stated in many speeches in England, that he was coming to the United States merely as a visitor in behalf of his country, and not as an emigrant. We ascertained months ago that our original expectations upon this subject had not been founded upon actual facts.

MR. BADGER. I understood all that before. What I meant to say was this: Not that the Secretary of State had spoken to the Senator from Mississippi to offer this resolution to receive an intended emigrant—not at all. It was the resolution of Congress under which the President was directed to bring him here which fixed the character and what he now expected. That resolution contemplated his coming as an emigrant. Whatever he might have said in England, we had no authoritative exposition from him before he landed here, that he was to act in any other character. When, therefore, these proceedings took place, I say that it is clear upon the record that they referred to an expected emigrant. As soon as Kossuth lands upon our shores, he assures us that we were mistaken, and that he does not come as an emigrant; that he does not purpose to become a citizen of the country; but that he is here as a visitor—not for the purpose of curiosity or improvement, but upon a political mission. He comes here to agitate among the people of this country, and to endeavor, so far as he can, to awaken among them a spirit which may prompt intervention in the future contest that is expected between Austria and Hungary—intervention in order to prevent the Czar from interfering. Now the whole character of the case is changed. We invited Kossuth, if we invited him at all, to come here for purposes personal to himself. We invited him to come here as an emigrant and live among us. He says, I come in no such character, for no purposes personal to myself; I come upon a political mission, to place myself in that character before the people of this country, and to induce them to give me pledges that they will make any intervention on the part of Russia in the affairs of Hungary, ineffectual. There has been no sanction given by the Executive Department of this Government, in any of its branches, to a resolution proposing to welcome this gentleman in any such character. It is one thing to welcome him as a distinguished foreigner, coming from exile to settle among us, and it is another and a very different thing to welcome him as a political agitator among our countrymen. Whatever else may be said, it is no diminution of the high character this gentleman occupies for intelligence and high standing to say, that it is in exceedingly bad taste, in my judgment, for a foreigner, who has just set his foot on our soil, who comes here to invoke our sympathies, to become a propagandist of his opinions, to endeavor to influence the people to the adoption of measures which he may think beneficial to the cause of Hungary, without regard either to the law or the policy of our Government; and to hint, not obscurely, that, whatever may be the action of Congress, he will appeal to the free-men of the United States, as our sovereigns.

Now, when emigrants come to this country to seek refuge from abroad; when they come to settle among us, and to mingle with our people, to enjoy the privileges of our institutions, to add energy to the industrial pursuits of our country, so that we may all together enjoy the blessings of civil liberty, and that they may become a perpetual strength to the country, we might well bid them welcome. And when emigrants come to this country, as sometimes they do, who are able to minister to our assistance, and to shed glory upon our country in different and far higher spheres, who are able to direct the thunder of our armies in the field, and to add grace and wisdom to our legislative counsels, I shall ever be ready, as, if my friend from Illinois [Mr. Shields] will permit me to say, I have in respect to him already done, to place them near to my heart. However it may not be in unison with the temper of the times, I say I thank no foreign emissary to come here and assume to instruct our people with regard to our duties at home or abroad. Whether it is a member of the British Parliament who endeavors to provoke sectional discord, and if possible to shake the fabric of this Union to pieces, or whether it is a Hungarian exile, however eminent, who comes here to persuade us either to make an empty boast and utter an unmeaning threat, and thus expose us to the derision of mankind, or else to mix us up in the turmoils of European politics and cause us to expend the blood and treasure of our free citizens in disputes with which they have no concern, and from which they can derive no benefit, terminate as they may, makes in this respect no difference to me. I can agree to welcome neither the one nor the other.

It may be, sir, that I have not got the idea of progress which is peculiar to the times. My honorable friend from New Jersey, [Mr. Slocum,] in speaking of that policy of non-intervention which we received from Washington, said that what was proper then might not be proper now, and he asks, Is adhering to that policy, progress? I think it is. A man may advance, though he does not change the road in which he travels. To make progress it is not necessary that a man should be perplexed and bewildered with repeated changes of direction, and perpetually retracing his steps, and beating out new and devious paths in which to tread. I want progress in old principles towards the full development of our institutions—to the consolidation of our liberty. Progress upon old principles to make us and to keep us Americanized forever. That is the progress which I wish.

Nor can I consider it entirely harmless in a person to come and inflame the people of the United States, or particular portions of the United States, hastily to commit themselves to measures like this. It is not only against the settled policy, but it is against the statute law of this country. Our law forbids armed intervention in all its forms, by citizens or others from the shores of the United States, in the affairs of other nations with whom we are at peace.

MR. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I believe the sedition law has been repealed.

MR. BADGER. It might perhaps be fortunate for some, in certain events, that the sedition law has been repealed. I am not affected by any reference to the sedition law. There is a sedition that does not depend upon that statute, and although that sedition law has been repealed, the repeal has not made sedition honorable. I say that it is not entirely innocent for any man to endeavor to inflame particular portions of the people of this country, in favor of this measure which Kossuth desires to recommend. Why is it not so? I was about to state why, when the anticipative genius of the Senator from Mississippi at once sprang far ahead of me, and he saw in his mind's eye that bugbear of the Democracy—the sedition law. We have a statute which forbids all armed intervention from this country in the affairs of any nation with which we are at peace. That statute forbids the sending forth, or setting on foot, of any such expedition, and it necessarily condemns all preparatory steps by which such a result is to be produced. If they do not fall within the provisions of the statute, so as to be punishable by law, they certainly and indubitably are morally criminal in their character.

What does this gentleman [Kossuth] want these fellow-citizens of ours to commit themselves to? Why to this: that this country shall furnish the material and means to prevent the Emperor of Russia from interfering in the future contest between Hungary and Austria. What means? Paper resolutions, printed protests, or protests written upon parchment with the seal of the United States attached? How much do we suppose they will sway the mind of the Czar? No, sir, the moment we take that ground—the moment we occupy the position he desires, (I do not say what gentlemen here contemplate,) we will have, in my judgment, placed ourselves in such a position that we must advance in the event of a future conflict and the interposition of Russia, which I suppose is just as certain as the future conflict itself, or we must ingloriously retire. We must either abandon the policy of the country and involve ourselves in distant and future quarrels, of which no man can foresee the issue, or after having threatened we must ignobly retreat. I am willing to welcome foreigners who come to our shores for just and laudable and useful purposes, but I am not willing to welcome by my vote any man who comes here to endeavor to commit the citizens of this country to any intervention in foreign transactions. In saying this I do not mean to cast reproach on Kossuth, for I can understand the enthusiastic temper and the character of the man. I can understand how he has been led, on his first landing in the United States, to believe that our people were ready to pour by thousands and hundreds of thousands, to join his standards. It is natural. He is wrapt up in Hungary. He is devoted to Hungary. He lives for Hungary, and he is prepared to die for Hungary. We can understand his natural feeling on this account. We can understand his strong desire to solicit aid for his country; but when I am called upon to vote for a resolution, and welcome to our shores one who has openly and publicly made this announcement of his purposes—one who has made the most powerful appeals to the passions of his auditors everywhere, I cannot help seeing that the inevitable interpretation of the proceeding must be that we receive him in that character; that we indorse him as a political missionary. I take it that, by doing that, we would welcome him here as one who is to receive assurances of armed intervention to prevent the interference of Russia in a future quarrel between Hungary and Austria. I do not think that such a course is consistent with what I owe to my own country. While I would hold myself ready to adopt any measure which I believed to be just, reasonable, fair, and honorable towards this unfortunate exile, I cannot, by giving my consent to this resolution, aid to mislead him into believing that he will receive any such aid from us.

Again, Mr. President, it has been said that we owe this testimony to Kossuth as the great impersonation of the principle of free government. It has not been my fortune, though I do not profess any large knowledge on this subject, to have found in the past history of Kossuth any evidence that he occupies such a position. I have watched with interest the struggle between Austria and Hungary, and felt a sincere and anxious desire that Hungary should succeed in vindicating her independence. I was satisfied, from the examination I was able to give the subject, that the Emperor of Austria had violated the fundamental conditions upon which, for centuries, the originally independent Kingdom of Hungary had been attached to the Austrian Crown, and fell under the control of the House of Hapsburg. It was not a contest to establish republican institutions, according to our understanding of the term. I have no evidence of any such purpose. It was a war for national independence—a war justifiable on the part of Hungary, because the fundamental condition of union had been violated, and because that violation was obstinately persevered in—and, therefore, whether Hungary had intended to establish a despotic or free government for herself, I should have heartily wished for her success in the conflict. It was the cause of national independence, not of republican institutions, which Kossuth urged. I doubt very much whether, in the whole struggle, the idea ever entered into his mind of a broadcast sowing of liberal principles and equal rights among his countrymen. He wished to establish an independent State and Nation under the supremacy of the Magyar race; leaving the Slavonians and other inferior castes to occupy the position that they had before occupied when the kingdom was connected with Austria. That I think is what he wished. It is a mistake, therefore, it seems to me, to suppose that Kossuth, in his struggles in Europe, was the embodiment of the principle of American freedom—freedom as we understand it. A country may be absolutely independent, and yet thoroughly despotic. Such is Russia. A country may be absolutely independent, and entirely aristocratical or absolutely independent and thoroughly Democratical. The interior regulations by which the public authority is distributed and the rights of the citizens are secured, are totally distinct from the position which in external relations makes the state or sovereignty independent. I am willing to admit that Kossuth represents a high principle—the principle of national independence, but not that of republicanism. When this subject is carefully considered, I think it will be found that the whole of it resolves itself into this: that Kossuth was expected or invited here as an emigrant—he came as a political emissary; and the question is, whether there is anything in our past history—in our present condition, in our present purposes, or our future prospects, which should induce us to pass a resolution of this kind in favor of one coming amongst us in that character and under such circumstances.

It has been said that his proceedings in Hungary were like those out of which sprang our own Declaration of Independence, and our State constitutions—our demands, originally small, growing larger as we advanced in strength. This, I think, is a mistake. Our fathers did not increase their demands on the British Government from time to time. They preferred a claim at once for all the rights of Englishmen—the rights which their ancestors enjoyed in England and brought here. They demanded no more. Although my friend from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] seemed to suppose that Englishmen, as such, have no rights, our revolutionary fathers claimed before the Declaration of Independence no rights but the rights of Englishmen. It was an invasion of their birth-right as English subjects of which they complained. For years they solicited the Crown and Parliament to maintain or restore to them their ancient rights, and when these solicitations had proved ineffectual, then, as a last resort, they flew to arms and declared themselves independent. They scarcely waited an hour after that declaration before the several States formed constitutions for themselves; and what do they embody in them? The principle of English freedom—such as the habeas corpus, and the trial by jury; the liberty of speech and of the press; and when they came to frame their own declarations of rights, where did they resort for the materials out of which they were to be framed? Did they not resort to that very England? Assuredly they did. They struck off the external form of monarchy, and they provided by republican forms for the security of their rights—the civil rights which they had enjoyed as Englishmen, but which, in consequence of the changes of time, had become insecure or threatened by their connection with that country. They did not begin by making small demands, and hypocritically reserving to themselves until they acquired more strength the whole of what they required. All they asked at all, they asked at first. They asked the rights of Englishmen, as they understood them—as they had enjoyed them—as long as hope of success remained, and when that hope was over, they declared themselves independent, and provided, by republican constitutions, security for themselves. That is what they did.

There is therefore, so far as I can see, nothing in our history, or the history and present position of Kossuth, which should induce us to pass this resolution. But if we do pass it, I am totally unable to perceive why gentlemen should object to the amendment which my friend from Georgia proposes, to include the associates of Kossuth in the same welcome with himself. If we are to welcome the one, why not welcome the other? Is it because the associates of Kossuth have made no political speeches that we will leave them out?

Shall he be selected for this honor because, instead of landing on our shores quietly, as they have done, and enjoying the hospitality, he has occupied his time in inflammatory addresses to the people? Is this a reason why he should be singled out from his fellows in captivity, and have alone this distinguished honor? Whatever we do for the one, in the way of honor and compliment, let us do for all. In my judgment, the American Congress would act wisely to do no such thing as is proposed by this resolution in respect to any of the parties; but if to one, then surely to all alike.

Mr. President, I wish not to be misunderstood about this matter. I would be far from offering any indignity to the distinguished man who has come upon our shores. Far, very far be it from me to do so. He who is the victim of oppression, he who has fallen in a contest nobly maintained for the maintenance of national independence, and seeks our shores, I would always receive with the most cordial feelings. He may forfeit them by his subsequent conduct; he may forfeit them by showing that he brings a restless spirit with him, which is incompatible with the security of any State; but my first impressions must always be decidedly and heartily in his favor. In making these remarks, I have merely given my reasons for declining to vote for the passage of the resolution; and for deeming it eminently proper, if it passes at all, that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Georgia should be attached to it.

Whatever may be the state of public opinion at present—excited, strongly and naturally excited, as the people now are—a calmer moment will ere long arrive. And if this resolution shall be adopted, I believe that at no distant day the whole American people will understand the character, and tendency, and consequences of this resolution—they will understand that, in the circumstances which surround us and give it significance, there is a great deal more implied than empty compliment or honorary gratulation; a great deal more than we can do in consistency with our past history, and with a just regard for our own interests and future peace and welfare.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] especially, to what I know he is as familiar with as any other man in existence—to one of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, for prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

I suppose that under that clause no one can doubt the right of the people peaceably to assemble. The right of freedom of speech is also fully secured. Therefore it seems to me that any gentleman, especially such an individual as this, invited to our shores and brought in a national vessel, might at least make a public speech without being denounced as a political emissary. I think he might be allowed to reply in a decent and proper manner to the addresses made to him by other persons. I venture to say that my friend from North Carolina, if he will look into the public prints of New York, will find that the demeanor of this gentleman since his arrival here has been modest, dignified, and judicious; that he has shown no intermeddling spirit; that he has not agitated against our institutions, but that under the most extraordinary tests he has manifested a disposition not to interfere in the least possible degree with domestic questions of any kind. He has said expressly that his mission is in behalf of his own country, and that he should deem himself disgraced if he were to utter or write a single word which could possibly be misconstrued to an intention on his part to interfere in our domestic concerns. These are the facts of the case. His speeches are all of one tenor and character. Yet the gentleman seems to conceive that in consequence of certain acts of Governor Kossuth, he is justified in denouncing him as an emissary. He cannot certainly be both an emissary and an emigrant. The gentleman's knowledge of philology has not, I think, been exactly as accurate on this occasion as it usually is. If he is an emigrant to this country, how can he be an emissary? We know that he is not an emigrant, because in England he took occasion to inform the whole civilized world that he came here as a visitor for legitimate purposes. How can the gentleman call him an emissary when he has not been sent? The word emissary is derived, as we all know, from two Latin words—the preposition ex and mitto, to send. Who sent him? I understand him to come here ex sua voluntate, to some extent. We declared the consent of the people—yea more than their consent—that he should come and receive hospitable entertainment from us, and interchange sentiments with us upon those questions on which every lover of freedom must feel an intense interest.

Although I entertain sentiments of the greatest respect for my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER:] although there is no one whom I esteem more highly, yet I must say that he has uttered doctrines this morning which, if carried to their full extent, would make this the most absolute despotism in the world, break down the freedom of speech which we now possess, and lead to such violent and despot proceedings as have outraged our sensibilities in republican France, and goaded the French people once more to the brink of civil revolution. I know the gentleman did not contemplate anything of the sort, but such would be the result of his doctrine. He seems to intimate that some interference should take place to prevent the speeches now being made by Governor Kossuth, which, in my opinion, are decorous, and modest, and eloquent. Certain portions of the American people have freely and voluntarily assembled, not only for the purpose of hearing him speak, but for the purpose of constraining him to speak by addresses delivered to him. This the gentleman seems to consider a great public grievance, and out of this he conceives great mischief is presently to flow. He seems to think that if this is allowed, it may have an injurious effect on the public quiet of the country, and tend to jeopard our free institutions.

The gentleman will allow me to say, in conclusion, that I would rather have traveled five hundred miles, on one of the hardest trotting horses in Christendom, without cessation and without sleep, and have submitted to all the discomforts that could possibly be experienced by a traveler under such circumstances, than listened to such an harangue from a gentleman whom I admire and love so much.

Mr. BADGER. It is one of the ordinary dexterities of accomplished debaters, among whom everybody knows the Senator from Mississippi occupies a high station, to put into the mouth of an adversary, language which he has not used. I have neither said nor intimated that I think Governor Kossuth should be arrested in his course of speeches.

Mr. FOOTE. I understood the gentleman to complain of the speeches now being made by Governor Kossuth, and to say that such speeches were dangerous, and to intimate clearly, that in his opinion, some steps ought to be taken, either positive or negative, to arrest him in what he deemed to be his mischievous course of proceeding. I suppose that the honorable gentleman meant that we should use the moral influence which would necessarily grow out of a refusal to do him these honors at the present time, and nothing more.

Mr. BADGER. I said nothing of the kind; and I said nothing from which anything of the kind could be inferred.

Mr. FOOTE. Did not the honorable Senator speak of moral sedition?

Mr. BADGER. I said nothing about moral sedition. I said this, and I will repeat it, that when I am called upon to give a vote of thanks to a foreigner who lands upon our shores, if I find him engaged in making political harangues to our people, the avowed object of which is to commit them to a course of conduct that may involve us in bragadocio toward a foreign Government, or in foreign war, that is sufficient reason with me to refuse that vote. I said that while the law of the land forbids any steps being taken for the purpose of organizing or setting on foot any such forcible interference with foreign States, it is not to my mind an entirely innocent thing for a foreigner to attempt to commit our people to the accomplishment of such an object by previous declarations.

That is what I said, and what I thought.

Mr. FOOTE. Did not the gentleman say at that point of his remarks, that the incipient step by inflammatory addresses which might lead to such a result was, in his judgment, highly censurable, and calculated to have a mischievous tendency, which, in his opinion, should be counteracted?

Mr. BADGER. I used no word of the kind. I said that if the law forbade the ultimate accomplishment, the incipient steps could not be innocent, whether punishable or not. I said nothing about inflicting punishment. I was assigning reasons why I could not vote for the resolution. It may seem very extraordinary to the Senator from Mississippi, but he must pardon me for saying, that with all my respect for and deference to him I must be governed by the exercise of my own judgment. The Senator gets up and reads an amendment to the Constitution about the liberty of the press and the liberty of speech. I have impugned neither right.

A short time ago we had another political emissary in this country. If the honorable Senator dislikes the name of emissary, he may dignify him with the name of missionary. We had a Mr. Thompson, a member of the British Parliament, coming over here exercising the liberty of speech, going about addressing public meetings in the New England States, endeavoring to stir up sectional feelings between different portions of the United States.

Mr. FOOTE. He was intermeddling with our domestic institutions.

Mr. BADGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FOOTE. Governor Kossuth has not done this.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly not.

Mr. FOOTE. Therefore the cases are not alike.

Mr. BADGER. The cases are not the same, but they may nevertheless be alike. If he who comes here to stimulate us to a domestic war is blameable, I think he who comes here to instigate us to a foreign war may be likewise blameable. It is the difference between "same" and "alike." The two cases are not the same, but they are in one respect alike.

I do not undertake to say whether Thompson could have been prosecuted and punished for anything he said. The Government of the United States has no sedition law, therefore, that would depend entirely on the laws of Massachusetts, and the other States, in which he made those flagitious appeals. Still, I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the conduct of that man as a great indignity, as a brutal insult, and as an infamous transaction on his part. When I say that, I do not intimate that he should be put in the pillory and whipped, because he made these speeches.

I am called upon here to give a vote in favor of this resolution, which, it seems to me, must be understood by the world as indicating that we approve the course Kossuth is pursuing, and the object for which he came. I do not approve of the course he is pursuing. I do not sanction the object for which he came; therefore, I will not, directly or indirectly, place myself in a position in which it can be attributed to me that I approved of it.

I am very sorry that my friend from Mississippi has such an idea of the character of my speech.

Mr. FOOTE. I thought it a very good one.

Mr. BADGER. We who have been here for the last four or five years have heard him characterize one hundred speeches in the same way. I have noticed that if any one makes a speech against any ground which the Senator from Mississippi supports, particularly if he makes a pretty good speech—that is, a speech which has any sense or reason in it, and which it is not so very easy for him to answer, he gets up and expresses his perfect astonishment and horror at hearing such barbarous, monstrous, and preposterous doctrines advanced, (laughter,) and declares that he would rather travel five hundred miles on a hard trotting horse than listen to him. (Great laughter.)

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President: Under an expectation that the first part of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] would secure some favor to this resolution, which it might otherwise lose, I yesterday intimated that I would give it my support. But discovering now that no such advantage is to be gained, I beg leave to recall what I then said. I shall vote with the original friends of the measure against the amendment.

I will suppose now that the opposition made to this resolution is effective. I will suppose that the measure is defeated. Let us look to the consequences beyond. What are they? Kossuth, admitted here to be the representative of the down-trodden constitutional liberties of his own country, and the representative of the up-rising liberties of Europe, shakes from his feet the dust that has gathered upon them on American shores, and returns to the Eastern Continent—returns upon a point of honor with the United States of America, and therefore, in a practical view, returns as he will say, and those devoted to his cause will say, repulsed, driven back. Where, then, sir, shall he find welcome and repose? In his own beautiful native land, at the base or on the slopes of the Carpathian hills? No! the Austrian despot reigns absolutely there. Shall he find it in Germany, east or west, north or south? No, sir; the despot of Austria and the despot of Prussia reign absolutely there. Shall he find it under the sunny skies of Italy? No, sir; for the Austrian monarch has crushed Italy to the earth. Shall he find it in Siberia, or in the frozen regions of the North? No, sir; for the Russian Czar, who drove him from his native land and forced him into exile in Turkey, will be ready to seize the fugitive. The scaffold awaits him there.

Where shall he go? Shall he seek protection again from the sceptred Turk? The Turk would say, You have eaten my salt as a voluntary captive, and I sheltered you until you left me under the seductions of the Republic of the United States. If you come now, the laws of my country and of my God will not oblige or allow me to hazard the peace of my own people again to extend protection over you. Where, then, shall he go? Where else on the face of broad Europe can he find refuge but in the land of your forefathers, in Britain? There, God be thanked, there would be a welcome and a home for him. Are you prepared to give to the world evidence that you cannot receive the representative of liberty and republicanism, whom England can honor, shelter, and protect?

But, Mr. President, will this transaction end there? I fancy that I see the exile winding his lonely way, with downcast looks, along the streets and thoroughfares of the great metropolis of Britain and the world, forsaken and abandoned, but not forgotten. Will it end in that? No, sir. Beyond us, above us, there is a tribunal, higher and greater than the Congress of the United States. It is a tribunal whose existence and jurisdiction and authority we have acknowledged, and to whose judgment-seat we have already called the Turk, the Austrian, and the Russian, to account for their action in regard to Hungary and to Kossuth. It is the tribunal of the public opinion of the world—the public opinion of mankind. Sir, that tribunal is unerring in its judgments. It is constituted of the great, the wise, and the good of all nations—not only of the great, and wise, and good who are now living, but of the great, the wise, and the good of all ages. Before that tribunal, States, great and small, are equal. Aye, before that tribunal the proudest empire is equal by its humblest citizen or subject. Yes, the Indian and the serf are equal there to the American Republic and to the Russian Empire. I know no living man entitled by the consent of Christendom to preside in that august tribunal. But there is a venerable form that seems to rise up before me, and all the congregated nations and people deferentially make way as he advances and takes the judgment seat. It is the shade of Franklin. And there I see the parties opposed. On the one side stands Hungary, downcast and sorrowful, but she is surrounded by the people of many lands, who wait her redemption and their own. On the other side I see the United States of America, sustained—most singular conjunction!—by the youthful and impatient Bonaparte, the sickly successor of the Romans, and the Czar of all the Russias. I hear the impeachment read. It is, that the United States have dishonored and insulted the unfortunate representative of unfortunate Hungary; that they found him a captive in Asia Minor, under the protection of the Turk, but subjected to the surveillance of the Russian Tyrant; that they addressed to him words of sympathy and hope, and that they brought to the doors of his captivity a national vessel, with their time-honored flag, and bade him to come upon its deck and be conveyed to a land of constitutional freedom—a land where the advocates and champions of universal liberty were sure to enjoy respect and sympathy and fraternal welcome; and that when they had so seduced him from a place of obscurity but of safety, and had thus brought him to their own shores; and when he stood waiting there for one simple word of welcome, one simple look of recognition, they turned away from him, spurned him from their presence, and cast him back upon the charities of Christian or Turk, in whatever land they might be found.

That is the impeachment. And the United States hold up the right hand and answer, "Not guilty." I see the books of testimony opened on behalf of Hungary. Here they are. A resolution of the Congress of the United States of America, passed in the year 1850, tendering the hospitalities of the nation, and the use of a national ship, to Louis Kossuth; then the message of the President of the United States, in 1851, calling upon Congress to say what shall be the ceremonial of receiving him who has been brought here under their authority; and then the record of this Senate, that upon a division of its members, a resolution of welcome was rejected. That constitutes the case on the part of Hungary. Sir, the United States appear in that august tribunal by learned and eloquent defenders and advocates. I see there my ardent and enthusiastic young friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] and the candid and learned Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] the impulsive and generous Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] the very learned and astute advocate who has just taken his seat, [Mr. BADGER,] and, lastly, he who holds the first place in our veneration of living Senators, save only one, (Mr. CLAY,) the honorable Senator from Georgia, who is now absent, [Mr. BERRIEN.] I listen to the long, elaborate, and earnest defence which they make against this impeachment. Hungary declines to reply; and Kossuth, the orator of modern times, upon whom she leans for support, for the first time overcome by a sense of cruel insult, is silent, dumb.

The defence is weighed by that august shade, in whose placid countenance I read at once the sagacity of the lightning hunter and the common sense of Poor Richard. "You say, that your invitation to the Magyar 'justified on his part and on the part of Hungary no expectation of a welcome.' How, then, came Kossuth, how came Hungary, how came the world, how came you, how came your President to misunderstand the invitation which was addressed to the exile? When did you first revise your diplomacy to ascertain to what extent you might abridge the hospitalities to which you had invited him? Not until you were committed before the world. You say that 'Kossuth was invited to be a resident, to become a citizen of the United States, and that he came, on the contrary, as a transient guest.' Grant it; what then? Is a welcome less due to him whom you have invited as a perpetual guest, when he comes to thank you and decline the courtesy, than if he had accepted it and become a perpetual charge upon your hospitalities? You say that the honors to Kossuth 'were moved in your Senate by ambitious aspirants for place and distinction.' Has, then, my country degenerated so much that there are no true, genuine patriots in the Senate of the United States who could lead that illustrious body in the discharge of so great a national obligation?

You plead that the Hungarian chief 'was a noble by birth, an aristocrat by education and association, and that he had devoted himself in an effort not to disseminate the spirit of universal liberty, but to fortify the privileges of the Magyar race?' If that be so, did you not know it when you invited him? If you did not, how can you justify your ignorance of a character that was blazoned to the world? But it is not true. Kossuth's first public action in early youth, was an effort, through the Hungarian Diet, to extend equal privileges of representation, of suffrage, and of taxation to all the people of Hungary, without distinction of rank, or cast, or race. For his fidelity to the great cause of human equality and freedom he was imprisoned three long years in a dungeon in the castle of Buda by the hand of the Austrian despot. When he came out from that captivity, he commenced that career of agitation for the restoration of the constitution of his country, which ended with success in the year 1848. When he had wrung that charter from the Emperor of Austria, his constitutional king, the first exercise of Hungarian authority by the Legislature which he directed, was an act which abolished all the feudal tenures, that brought land within the reach of all, and put the Croat, the Waldachian, the Illyrian, the Jew, and the Magyar upon the same platform of equality before the law, equality before the government, equality in representation, equality in suffrage, and equality in enduring the burdens of government. It was for this that he was hunted from his native land and came an exile to your shores. Who pursued him there with reproaches of falsehood to freedom? Not the Jew, the Croat, or the Slave, but the tyrant of Austria, who has reduced all the people of Hungary, of whatever rank or race or cast, to the level of slaves.

You say that you were willing to give Kossuth a welcome, but that he demanded more. How did you know that he 'demanded more?' How did you learn that Kossuth demanded more than a cordial welcome? Where did he ask of you even so much as a welcome? Was it in your capital? To whom did he address his extravagant and offensive reclamation? Was it to your President? to your Ministry? to your Congress? No; all alike refused to receive him, refused even to hear him speak, and yet you say he demanded too much. You closed his mouth before he had time to tell you what he thought, and what he wanted, or whether he wanted anything. But you reply he was overheard to say that he expected arms, men, money, 'material aid, and intervention.' Overheard? What! did you deliver Kossuth from Russian surveillance in Turkey to establish an espionage over him of your own? Shame! shame to the country that so lightly regards the sanctity of the character of a stranger and an exile. But you say that he would have demanded intervention. Suppose he should? Would you have been less able to have met that unreasonable demand after having accorded to him the exact justice which was his due, than you are now when you have done him injustice, and thus clothed him with the sympathies of your people and of mankind! But you aver that he spoke irreverently of your authority: he was overheard to say, in the outgushing of his gratitude to the generous people who received him on Staten Island, that the people were the sovereigns of the government of the United States? and you cannot pardon that offence. What if he did say that? Are not the people the sovereigns of the Government of the United States? Which one of your Senators or Representatives dare deny in his place that the People are his sovereigns? But you say that you had a precedent; that you once took offence at a Minister of France who assumed the same position. You refer to Genet. But there is no parallel. Genet was a minister of a Government actually hostile, almost belligerent. He was in negotiation, and his demands were denied. He took an appeal from the decision of your Government to the people. But Kossuth is no minister. He is your guest. He went to you not to negotiate, or to demand a right. He went by your invitation to enjoy your hospitality. You have decided nothing against him. He submitted no appeal. I do not say that you ought to have granted intervention had it been demanded. But I do say this, that the Hungarian would have demanded no more of you than, in a strait less severe than his, I solicited and obtained for the United States of America from the Bourbon of France. Could you not have pardoned him for asking what you had once asked and obtained for yourselves? Was it so great a fault in him to suppose that now, in the day of your greatness, prosperity, and power, you might not be unwilling to do for Hungary what, in the day of your infancy, poverty, and weakness, France had done for yourselves? You say you stand upon precedent. Precedent? By whom established? By yourselves. Was Hungary concluded by such a precedent? And what precedent? The precedent of the reception given to Lafayette? Was not even that reception grudgingly given by the Congress of the United States? If the ashes of Lafayette could be reanimated, and he could present himself again upon your shores, would you not now willingly accord him a greater than the welcome he before received at your hands?—a welcome, such as it was proposed to give to Kossuth? Wherein does the parallel between Kossuth and Lafayette fail? Lafayette began his career as a soldier of liberty in the cause of your country; but he pursued it through life in an effort to establish a republic in his own beloved land. Kossuth found the duty which first devolved upon him was to wage a struggle for freedom in his own country. When overborne there, he became, like Lafayette, a champion of liberty throughout the world. You say that the Russian might have taken offence. Is America, then, brought so low that she fears to give offence when commanded by the laws of nature and of nations? What right had Russia to prescribe whom you should receive and whom reject from your hospitalities? Let no such humiliation be confessed.

Thus in the tribunal of the public opinion of mankind, all our pleas are disallowed. We have exposed ourselves to the censure—I will not say to the derision, of the world.

It is said, Mr. President, that there is danger of intervention if we accord these honors; that intervention will follow them. No, sir; it is not a question of intervention future, but of intervention past! There has been intervention already. Russia has intervened and Hungary has fallen by that crime. Kossuth is an exile upon our shores in consequence of it. What we have done already, was by manifesting our sympathy for him, to express our abhorrence of the intervention of Russia, which has worked so great injustice, and to rebuke and prevent such intervention hereafter. What do we now propose to do? To grant a welcome to Kossuth. It is but the fit conclusion of an action already near complete. I greatly fear that we do not understand our own interests in this great question. We cannot extinguish sympathy for freedom elsewhere, without extinguishing the spirit of freedom which is the life of our own Republic.

Again, sir, you may reject Kossuth; you may, if you please, propitiate despotic favor by trampling the exiles of all Europe under your feet. But what will you have gained? This Republic is, and forever must be, a living offence to Russia and to Austria, and to despotic powers everywhere. You will never, by whatever humiliations, gain one friend or secure one ally in Europe or America that wears a crown. It is clear that the days of despotism are numbered. We do not know whether its end is to come this year, or next year, or the year after; in this quarter of a century or in this half of a century. But there is to come, sooner or later, a struggle between the representative and the arbitrary systems of government. Europe is the field on which that struggle must take place. While the representative principle is gaining strength among the people, the power of Russia is seen to culminate. That struggle will be between Russia, whose power extends across the whole northern part of the Eastern Hemisphere, and all the people of southern and western Europe. If the Russian Autocrat prevail in that contest, we shall be left without friends or allies in the Eastern World. Is it wise to deny ourselves the benefits of alliances with States kindred in political interests and constitutions? Far otherwise; true wisdom dictates that we lend to European nations, struggling for civil liberty, all possible moral aid to sustain them until they can mature and perfect their strength for that great conflict, through which they are doomed to pass. The nations that we thus lawfully aid to raise up, will constitute a lasting and impregnable bulwark for ourselves.

Mr. RHETT. I do not rise to debate this question, although I might have thought of saying something. I rise merely to suggest to the Senate, that as we have had a very long discussion on this subject, and as the gentleman who offered the resolution has had an opportunity of replying to its opponents, we should now take the vote.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I rise simply to say, that I have paired off with the Senator from Maryland, who has been called home this evening. But for that, I should vote against all amendments and for the original resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to say that I have paired off with my colleague, [Mr. Rusk,] who is too unwell to appear to-day.

The question being taken on the first branch of the amendment of Mr. BERRIEN, that the welcome offered to Kossuth be extended to his associate Hungarian exiles, resulted—yeas 13, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Geyer, King, Morton, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Walker—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Miller, Norris, Rhett, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, and Whitcomb—27.

So it was not agreed to.

The question then being on the other branch of the amendment—

"But while welcoming these Hungarian patriots to an asylum in our country and to the protection which our laws do, and always will, afford to them, it is due to candor to declare that it is not the purpose of Congress to depart from the settled policy of this Government which forbids all interference with the domestic concerns of other nations."

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was modified by substituting "this Hungarian exile" for "these Hungarian exiles," in consequence of the rejection of the first branch of the amendment.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on the amendment as modified, resulted—yeas 15, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Butler, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Geyer, Hunter, King, Miller, Morton, Rhett, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Norris, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—26.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. When this resolution was first introduced, I gave notice that I should move to substitute in place of it the resolution originally introduced by the Senator from Mississippi. I now move to amend by striking out all after the resolving clause of this resolution, and inserting:

That a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, to consist of three members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the presiding officers of the respective Houses to make suitable arrangements for the reception of Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, on his arrival in the United States, and to communicate to him assurances of the profound respect entertained for him by the people of the United States; and to tender to him, on the part of Congress, and in the name of the people of the United States, the hospitalities of the Metropolis of the Union.

Mr. BORLAND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "That," and inserting—

"The Congress, in the name and on behalf of the people of the United States, cordially sympathize with the people of Hungary in their recent laudable and heroic struggle, and in their present misfortunes; that it recognizes and cordially welcomes Louis Kossuth, late Governor of Hungary, and his associate exiles, who have recently landed on our shores, as worthy representatives of their country, and invites them to the capital, as guests of the Union; that it requests the President of the United States to receive and entertain them, in such manner as he may deem proper; and that the sum of — dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated and placed at the disposal of the President, to pay the expenses of the reception and entertainment of such guests during their sojourn at the capital."

I will not detain the Senate with anything like a speech on this subject. The Senate has already heard a great deal on the subject, and it has heard remarks more valuable and interesting than any I could make. I propose, in a few words, to state the reasons why I offer this amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. With the consent of the Senator, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BORLAND. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I hope the friends of the measure will insist on coming to a final vote.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw the motion, in order to make a single remark. If the proposition of my friend from Arkansas shall be adopted, I, and perhaps others, may desire to say something. I was very much in hopes that the resolution might have passed in the form proposed by the Senator from New York, without any call for the yeas and nays. I shall object to the resolution in any other form. Any other form of the resolution will lead to great division of opinion. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BORLAND. I would say to the Senator from South Carolina that I shall not occupy five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withdraw.

Mr. BORLAND. I offer this resolution, as the only one for which I can vote under the present circumstances of the case. In paying this compliment to a distinguished foreigner, I wish to pay it in a substantial manner. I do not want to commit this Government to any course of policy which he may have indicated. This proposition is simply to welcome him as a distinguished stranger, one who has rendered services to his country which have deserved the admiration of the world. Inasmuch as the President of the United States has called the attention of Congress to the subject of a reception, I am for carrying out the resolution of the last session. Then we submitted to the President the employment of a public vessel, and I am now for leaving the question of entertainment to his discretion. In the amendment, I propose to place a sum of money at the disposal of the President for that purpose. In this amendment I have styled Kossuth "the late Governor of Hungary." I have done so in accordance with the historic fact. He was Governor of Hungary. He voluntarily resigned that place to another, and therefore he is no longer Governor.

Mr. FOOTE. I know that the honorable Senator from Arkansas does not intend to insult the gentleman whom he calls "the late Governor of Hungary," but who calls himself the Governor of Hungary in his last speech. He is recognized, I think, by the lovers of liberty throughout the world as virtually the Governor of Hungary—as the Governor de jure though not de facto. I am satisfied that there is no intention to insult the gentleman by calling him the late Governor of Hungary, and by proffering to him pecuniary aid in the manner proposed; but I beg leave to call the attention of my friend, to the fact that, speeches have been recently made by Governor Kossuth in New York, in which he expressly declares his entire unwillingness to receive the sort of entertainment proffered by the amendment. I must say in addition that, as I am a democrat and a strict constructionist, I doubt our power to do anything of the kind in the form now proposed; and I am assured of one thing, we should dishonor Governor Kossuth, and the cause in which he is engaged, by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. RHETT. I shall vote for the simple resolution of the Senator from New York, and shall vote for none of these amendments. If the friends of the measure want a large vote in its favor they had better stand to the simple proposition of the Senator from New York.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that his substitute will be accompanied by one very great embarrassment. Under the rules of the other House, every appropriation of money must be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and go on the calendar in its regular order. If, therefore, we send the proposition to the House with an appropriation of money in it, we shall delay action there. I shall, therefore, vote against it.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no objection to striking from the amendment that portion of it making an appropriation of money. It has seemed to me, however, that if we undertake to do a thing we should provide means of doing it. How are we to treat Kossuth and his associates as the guests of the nation without some expense?

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Foote] objects to calling Kossuth the late Governor of Hungary. I call him so, in accordance with the historic fact. The only history which I have seen, which gives a reliable account of the Hungarian struggle, is the book of Dr. Naphegyi, which, it has been stated, has been submitted to intelligent Hungarians, who have pronounced its statements correct. He was a great friend to Kossuth and to Hungary. He there asserts, as a historical fact, that Kossuth did yield his Governorship to Görgy, the individual who betrayed his country and delivered it up to Austrian power. Kossuth constituted, as far as he could, Görgy the Dictator of Hungary, and with the power thus conferred, he abandoned the battles which had been begun, and delivered his country into the hands of Austria. Kossuth voluntarily resigned the office of Governor, and therefore it is that I have called him the late Governor of Hungary. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. SHIELDS.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I had desired to express my views upon the subject which has occupied so much of the time of the Senate, but I have been for action, and prompt action. I have known well that every word uttered in this body on that subject has delayed action, and thus impaired the value of any action that we shall take. I shall vote with very great reluctance against the proposition submitted by the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I shall vote against it for the reason, amongst others, which has governed me in voting against all other amendments, viz: that the proposition of the Senator from New York is simple, fit, and adequate. It expresses the sentiments of the American people in reference to our distinguished guest, and I know of no form of expression by which we can add to its force, and none which will not impair its simplicity. I must therefore vote against this proposition. Whilst I do it for that reason, and should consider that reason of itself sufficient, we know that when the distinguished benefactor of America, Lafayette, was received by Congress, a joint resolution was proposed and a joint committee was raised, and that joint committee reported that it was impossible for the two Houses to act jointly. If, then, the proposition of the Senator from Illinois be adopted, it may result in a similar report, and thus still further delay the action which the occasion, and all the circumstances of the occasion, so imperatively demand should be prompt, frank, and generous.

Mr. SHIELDS asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Norris, Shields, Stockton, Walker and Whitcomb—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Chase, Clarke, Clemens, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Hamlin, Hunter, James, King, Miller, Morton, Rhett, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, and Wade—22.

The joint resolution was then reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays on the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Foote of Mississippi, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mallory, Miller, Norris, Rhett, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Clemens, Dawson, Morton, and Underwood—6.

The joint resolution was then read a third time and passed.

RECESS.

On motion, it was ordered, that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 15, 1851.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. BELL presented the credentials of the Hon. JAMES C. JONES, elected a Senator of the State of Tennessee for six years from the 4th March, 1851. The oath having been administered, Mr. JONES took his seat.

Hon. WILLIAM K. SEBASTIAN, from the State of Arkansas, appeared in his seat.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of Joseph A. Barelli, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to issue a register to the brig Ada, late the British brig Josephine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of the Italian Mutual Benevolent Society of New Orleans, praying that certain marble to be used in the construction of a tomb or monument for the reception of the mortal remains of the members of the Society may be imported free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Jehiel Brooks, praying authority to sue the United States for damages sustained by him in defending his title to certain land against a suit brought against him by the United States under false representations; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RHETT presented the memorial of George Hervey, agent for the owners and consignees of the English ship James Mitchell, praying the payment of a sum of money due under an act of Congress, and retained in the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Ursula E. Cobb, widow of Charles Cobb, late a gunner in the Navy, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the memorial of the executrix and securities of Benjamin F. Hart, deceased, late a purser in the Navy, praying that his accounts may be cancelled on the books of the Treasury; which, with their memorial and papers on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Nancy Wright, widow of an officer in the revenue service; which, with the papers on file, were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FELCH presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, in favor of the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of the Ste. Marie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Michigan, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress to use their exertions to procure the repayment of the money expended by her in furnishing volunteers for the Mexican war, and the expenses incurred in defending her territorial boundary as established by Congress before her admission as a State into the Union; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of B. F. Palmer and several others, citizens of Philadelphia, exhibitors of articles at the late Industrial Exhibition held in London, praying that an appropriation be made to pay the expenses incurred by citizens of the United States for the transportation and display of goods at the Industrial Exhibition at London; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of Mary Walker, widow of George W. Walker, late Paymaster of the Marine Corps, praying to be allowed the traveling expenses of her late husband in the settlement of his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of William M. Lapsley, receiver of public moneys at Cahaba, Alabama, praying compensation for services in making entries of land under bounty land warrants.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, moved to lay it on the table, as the committee had made a report on the subject; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented the memorial of William Butler, praying to be allowed a pension on account of injuries received in the naval service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of John W. Simonton and others, owners of the Island of Key West, in Florida, praying indemnity in consequence of its occupancy by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GEYER presented the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying a grant of land for the construction of the Lexington and Davies County Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying a grant of land for the construction of the Northern Missouri Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, praying a grant of land for the construction of a plank road from Tully, in that State, to Bloomfield, in Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, praying that an island in the Missouri river, opposite the town of Weston, may be granted for the improvement of the harbor and landing of that town; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, praying a grant of eighty acres of land to every free white citizen, being the head of a family and not a land owner; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, praying the construction of piers and harbors in the Delaware river and bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial of the heirs at law of Henry Miller, praying compensation for the military services of their ancestor in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of Samuel C. Morton and twenty-eight other citizens of Philadelphia, praying Congress to provide for the erection of such piers and harbors in the Delaware river and bay as will afford shelter and protection to vessels, &c., navigating said river.

This petition (said Mr. B.) contains a brief but truthful statement showing the importance, if not the absolute necessity, for the appropriation therein asked. From the breakwater at the mouth of Delaware bay, to the city of Philadelphia, a distance of ninety miles, there is not a single safe harbor, in consequence of which valuable lives and large quantities of property are lost. According to the custom-house returns, there were twenty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty-five vessels entered the port of Philadelphia during the year 1850, and that from the first of January, 1830, to the first of January, 1851, the duties paid exceed $59,000,000, and that but a comparatively small sum has been expended in improving said harbor. In view of these facts, he asked the early and serious attention of the Committee of Commerce to the subject. Referred to said committee.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the memorials and papers on the files of the Senate, relating to the claims of Roddy, Carter, and Jennings, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Asenath M. Elliott, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Ezra Williams, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claims of William S. Waller, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the petition of General Robert Armstrong, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Roger Jones, and the memorial of Margaret Hetzel, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. JONES of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition of Harriet R. F. Capron, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRODHEAD submitted an additional document relating to the claim of Thomas Flanagan; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and a donation of public land, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama.

Also, a bill to reduce the price of the public lands lying south of the "Old Choctaw Line," in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. MALLORY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to repeal an act entitled "An act concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels," passed on the 30th day of June, 1834.

Mr. BRADBURY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801.

Mr. HUNTER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the compensation of such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the 15th section of the act of August 6, 1846, for additional services required under that act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORLAND. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred a bill for the relief of Mrs. Margaret L. Worth, widow of the late General Worth, to report back the same without amendment. I would ask, as it is a matter which will give rise to no discussion, and as the same bill passed the Senate last session, that it be considered now. I may state as a reason, what is known to many Senators present, that Mrs. Worth widow of the late gallant General Worth, is in very straitened pecuniary circumstances; and this bill provides relief for her and her family. It was passed at the last session without a dissenting vote, and failed in the House simply, I presume, for want of time. As it is not likely to give rise to any discussion, and as it is one of great merit, which every Senator will acknowledge, I ask that it be considered now.

Mr. RHETT. I object. It is, no doubt, a proper bill; but there is another matter which I am desirous should be taken up now.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill granting a pension to Sally T. Floyd, widow of George R. C. Floyd, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Army of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to revive a portion of an act for the relief of the widows of deceased soldiers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Judith Worthen, deceased, reported a bill for their relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. J. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of citizens of Niagara county, New York, in behalf of Stephen Warren, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of it.

Mr. SEWARD. It appears that that petition was referred, under an erroneous view of the nature of the case, to the Committee on Pensions. I do not object to the committee being discharged from its further consideration, but would move its reference to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH MINT.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred a bill to establish a branch Mint of the United States in California, reported back the same with an amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senate will indulge me in taking up this bill at this time. It has already passed the Senate once, and favorably reported upon unanimously by the Committee on Finance. It contains no appropriation of money. It only provides for the establishment of a branch Mint in California. I hope it will be considered now.

No objection being made, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out the eighth section of the bill relating to the assaying office, and substitute in its place the following:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if required by the holder, gold in grain or lumps shall be refined, assayed, cast into bars or ingots, and stamped in said branch Mint, or in the Mint of the United States, or any of its branches, in such manner as may indicate the value and fineness of the bar or ingot, which shall be paid for by the owner or holder of said bullion at such rates and charges and under such regulations as the Director of the Mint, under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, may from time to time establish.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the said branch is established in the State of California, and public notice shall be given thereof in the mode to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, then so much of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1851, and for other purposes, as provides for the appointment of a United States assayer and the contracting for the assaying and fixing the value of the gold in grain or lumps, and for forming the same into bars, be, and the whole of the clause containing said provisions, shall be hereby repealed.

Mr. HUNTER. This bill contains no appropriation. It simply provides for the establishment of a branch Mint in California. The bill as first introduced contained a provision for abolishing the present assaying office. That the committee did not adopt. They have substituted a provision to allow the holder of gold in grains or lumps to take ingots or bars at pleasure at such rates and charges as shall be appointed. In all other respects it is similar to the bill passed last year.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. BRODHEAD called for the reading of the section relating to the compensation of the officers.

After the reading of the bill had been proceeded with for a short time,

Mr. BRODHEAD said: I do not desire that the bill should be read any further. I understand that the salaries provided for in this are the same as those contained in the bill as it passed last session. I shall have no objection to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish a Board of Accounts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WELCOME TO KOSSUTH.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that it had passed the joint resolution of welcome to Louis Kossuth.

In the course of the day the joint resolution was engrossed and signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that Mr. GORMAN of Indiana, Mr. HAVEN of New York, and Mr. STANTON of Kentucky, had been appointed members of the Joint Committee on Printing.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I rise to make a very short explanation. While I have been struck with the general accuracy of our Reporters this session, and the accommodating spirit which they have manifested towards myself and other Senators, yet I feel bound to state that it has happened that my hastily-delivered remarks made the other day, by way of explanation of one or two points raised by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] were reported erroneously; and I rise for the purpose of correcting one of several mistakes. I hope the Reporters will not be pained at my saying that those mistakes would not have occurred if they had pursued their usual course—and the one which they are always bound to pursue—of bringing the report to the Senators before it is published in the papers. I do not censure them; but I regret that the necessity has arisen for making this explanation.

I will state what I am about to correct. The honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] uttered certain general political doctrines to which I objected the other day. I am reported as saying "they break down the freedom of the press, destroy the freedom of speech, and after a while would lead to just such violent proceedings as have outraged the sensibilities of the so-called 'republican Government of France,'" &c.

I intended to be understood as saying, substantially, that they broke down the liberty of the press and destroyed the freedom of speech, and that while leading to just such violent proceedings as those adopted by the so-called republican Government of France, and which so outraged the feelings of the people of that country, &c. I rise more for the purpose of protesting, in this gentle and respectful manner, against the whole report made the other day, and with the view of giving this delicate and admonitory hint to the Reporters that they may always be kind enough to bring the report to me before it is published.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to say a word. I would not have said anything upon this subject, had not the Senator from Mississippi brought it up. Though I do not choose to enter into any corrections, I would say that I noticed a number of mistakes in the remarks made by me the other day. They can, of course, only be avoided as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, by giving Senators an opportunity of correcting.

[The report alluded to was not one published in the "Globe."]

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I hope the Senate will now take up the special order. I am informed at this moment that a gentleman who will go home to-morrow, or at some early moment, wishes to be heard upon the resolution which I submitted, and to reply to the few remarks I made the other day. For one, I am exceedingly anxious to accord him the opportunity.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery, and as such, that said measures should be acquiesced in and faithfully observed by all good citizens.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am very sorry that this debate has been suspended, because what I would have said last week would have been said in a very few words, and distinctly in reference to the topic before me. To resume and continue the debate now will not obviate the incidental injustice to myself and others, occasioned by so long a suspension. I went into the debate last Monday morning unexpectedly; that is to say, I spoke from information acquired only the day before. I had not seen any of the notices in the newspapers of the honorable Senator's resolution. I had not learned that they had been proposed in the Democratic caucus. Although, in some measure, I might have spoken from information thus acquired, my remarks were made mainly from views which I took of the subject whilst hearing the honorable Senator from Mississippi.

While I denounced his proposition as a mode of ratification of the compromise to which I had been opposed, I said not one single word, I made not a single allusion to his own State, or to himself, except, perhaps, of a political character, and that rather by implication than by any distinct expression. He was pleased to say I had come into the debate inopis conciliis. I came into it, however, with nothing like militia præcogitata. I soon learned that I was contending with one who was conducting his movements with the concert and skill of political tacticians. But even regarding him as an organ confining himself to the views and purposes of himself and others, I might have felt little inclination or desire to continue and widen the debate. When, however, the gentleman enlarged the scope and aim of his remarks, and gave them such a direction that they could not escape me and others; and when he made allusions under a degree of excitement and passion for which I was not prepared, I had no alternative left but to make a rejoinder. They are allusions and remarks which cannot escape myself, in connection with the measures he has brought up for ratification, as a representative of the State of South Carolina. He knows as well as any man upon this floor, how painful it is to me to have anything like an occasion to participate in a debate of this kind. There are incidents in our lives which he knows very well make this painful to me. I must, however, discharge my duty, and I hope I shall do so in such a manner that, whilst I may show to the gentleman that "he who lives in a glass house should not throw stones," I may also endeavor to vindicate myself from some of the allusions and remarks which were intended to reach me. When I saw the gentleman, with so much deliberation, draw from his quiver arrows that had been laid aside for a contest for which I was not prepared, I confess that I then looked with surprise as well as concern upon the course which the debate was likely to take.

If the gentleman had satisfied himself with simply avowing that he intended to put the seal of approbation upon the compromise measures, I might not have had cause to complain so much. If he had contented himself with being entirely silent as regards the effect which his resolution would have upon those who opposed it, I might not, perhaps, have been altogether satisfied, but I would not have taken material exceptions. But he went much further, and not only bestowed applause and commendation upon the cherished compromise measures, but turned round and fired on the camp of his former comrades. My duty to that camp, deserted as it has been, requires me to vindicate its history and the conduct of those who are connected with it. Under the cover of the proposition now before the Senate, there seems to be a double aim—to make a new platform for the security of some, and to expose others who are not willing to be forced from their original position; and this, too, in a manner unprecedented in the legislative history of this country, or any other. It is a mode of ratification of what is regarded as a popular measure by certain politicians—of course not so much for their own advantage as for the good of the whole country—not to give up to party what is meant for mankind. I may take a different view of the matter. Instead of quieting agitation and restoring harmony, this proceeding will sow the seeds of discord among those who have a common interest to defend the rights of the States, especially the Southern States, which are alone in danger, and which must be doomed if their true friends suffer party organizations to divide and destroy them. This measure is to be an ark for the elect of the land to be saved from the great deluge that may be coming over us. I suppose politicians will go into it by pairs, of different kinds, to make an improvement by amalgamation, as Mr. Burke said of a similar class, a Mosaic-work, "here a black piece, and there a red one," &c. The benevolent plan is to put to the sword all who are to be excluded from the ark, or who cannot be admitted into it by a party passport.

I know that the honorable Senator said that his resolution originated in an enlarged patriotism, having no reference to party tactics. Sir, I have always remarked, that when patriotism becomes so diffused and enlarged, it becomes rather weaker than stronger. I did not know what the honorable Senator was aiming at, but, as I said then, I knew what the effect would be. Now, before I allude to or notice some remarks which specially claim my attention, I will dispose, by way of explanation, of some of the charges, or complaints perhaps I should say, which he made against those who had charge of the fugitive slave bill. He intimated that they did not do their duty to it. Perhaps the charge was not made so strongly as to accuse them of bad faith in relation to it, but it was something like it.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I expressly disclaimed it.

Mr. BUTLER. The charge was, that they had not brought forward the bill with that promptness, and urged it upon the consideration of the Senate with the energy, which the occasion, in the opinion of the gentleman, and some of his special friends, called for. I made an explanation in reference to the bill once before. It was at the first session of the last Congress called up at an early day, and I made my speech upon it as the chairman of the committee; and my friend from Virginia [Mr. MASON] had also made a speech upon it, when, the late Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] having the floor, the whole discussion was suspended, to give the Senator from Kentucky, not now in his seat, [Mr. CLAY,] an opportunity of bringing before the Senate his measures of compromise. No objection was then made to letting the bill drop for awhile; but before the Committee of Thirteen had matured and disposed of their work, I suppose the suggestion was made to bring up the fugitive slave bill as a separate measure. Perhaps it was intended to make it a test in advance. Some of us who had charge of the bill might not have been inclined to yield too readily to the suggestions of those in whose course of policy we did not exactly agree, or there may have been a fair difference of opinion as to the mode of using the fugitive slave bill. But when the bill was brought up under the suggestion of the honorable gentleman, and with the understanding that his Northern friends and allies would support it, how many of them voted for it? The two gentlemen from Iowa [Messrs. DODGE and JONES] voted for the bill, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, no longer a member of this body, [Mr. STURGEON,] voted for the bill. The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON,] no longer here, would have voted for it, and explained at the time the reasons why he did not, having paired off with his colleague. There were but three Northern Senators who voted for it. Let the country understand now, for the first time, if it never has been understood before, why honorable gentlemen from the North, who are now so vehement upon the subject of these compromises, did not vote on that bill, either for or against it. When the compromise measures have swum to the shore, there are some willing to stretch out the hand of aid, but were unwilling to run the hazard of the flood when it was uncertain as to the fate of the bill referred to. Did they avoid that vote? or were they absent by accident when the vote was taken? Some of those gentlemen, I know, gave their moral support to the bill; but I state the fact, that it was not until the bill had gone to the country, and obtained its favorable judgment, as they suppose, that some gentlemen became its open advocates. So much for that.

Now for another complaint and charge, which the honorable Senator has made, which may apply to myself, that is, denying the President power to enforce the law. I beg to bring to the attention of the Senate the report which I submitted in relation to the President's message, calling for additional legislation to enable him to enforce the fugitive slave law.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I thought that I was distinctly understood by the whole Senate in stating that I had no allusion to the honorable Senator in connection with this matter. I recollected his report, and I have had occasion to read it in my own State in language of commendation. He expresses some opinions in the report in which I do not entirely concur. But I was exceedingly struck with a portion of the language used in the report, expressing confidence in the disposition of the Executive to perform his duty faithfully in executing the powers vested in him on this important subject.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to have the report read, not so much for any vindication of myself as that the Senate may understand my views.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

"In submitting my views on the message of the President referred to the Judiciary Committee, it is not my purpose to express my dissent from the general and unqualified conclusion of the majority of the committee, to wit: that it is unnecessary at this time, by further legislation, to give the President power over the militia and military forces of the Government, for the purpose of suppressing insurrections and combinations to obstruct the execution of the laws."

"There are some subjects of the message presented to the consideration of Congress, and which address themselves specially to the consideration of the committee, upon which I feel it a duty to express an opinion, lest by silence there might be a tacit recognition of one of the assumptions and an approbation of some of the recommendations of the message."

"Previously to the act of 1807, it seems to have been the implied understanding of all the departments of the Government that the President was confined to the militia, to suppress insurrections against the State government and to suppress combinations against the laws of the United States."

"The act of 1795 indicates the occasions and prescribes the manner in which the militia shall be called out and employed. The President cannot order the militia to suppress insurrection against the State government, without being called on to do so by the legislative or executive authority of the State concerned."

"To suppress combinations against the laws of the United States, it is the duty of the President to judge of the occasion for calling out the militia. On all occasions for calling out and employing the militia, it was made the duty, by the act referred to, to issue his proclamation as a previous warning to the employment of force."

"This provision was founded in usage, and has had the sanction of time, trial, and experience. It is but the warning voice of a forbearing Government. There might be some occasions when the interval between such warning and the actual employment of force might be of some duration. Other occasions might be such as to require the force to follow in quick succession to the warning of a proclamation. The order to call out the militia and the proclamation might emanate at the same time."

"It seems to have been in contemplation by the act of 1795 to put at the disposal of the President a quasi military posse comitatus of citizen soldiers, to maintain the dominion of the laws, in which they had the interest of citizens."

It was to make use of one class of citizens to bring another to a sense of justice and a proper submission to the law. I approve its wisdom. An insurrection would be much more easily quelled by the array of neighbors and fellow-citizens, than by the employment of a trained and organized army, whose only influence would be the employment of force. An overwhelming force might be employed in the first case, whilst the other might only be strong enough to provoke collision, and end in blood. Whatever might be the views of our ancestors, it is certain that until 1807 the militia was the only force put at the disposal of the President to suppress insurrection, &c.

"The act of 1807 is in these words: 'That in cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for suppressing such insurrection or causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purpose such part of the land and naval force as shall be necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.'

"So far as it regards the employment of the army and naval force, the President maintains that he is subject to no prerequisites of the act referred to, but that they are absolutely at his command for the purposes indicated."

"The words of the President are: 'Congress, not probably adverted to the difference between the militia and the regular army by the act of March 3, 1807, authorized the President to use the land and naval forces of the United States for the same purposes for which he might call forth the militia, and subject to the same proclamation. But the power of the President under the Constitution as commander of the army and navy is general, and his duty to see the laws executed is general and positive; and the act of 1807 ought not to be construed as evincing any disposition in Congress to limit or restrain any of his constitutional authority.'

"The import of which is, that the President may use the Army and Navy as he may think proper under the plenitude of his constitutional authority, and that he is not constrained by the act of 1807, nor can he be restrained by any act of Congress. Being ex officio commander, he can use the Army in suppressing insurrections in a manner different from that in which he is required to use the militia."

"For the specific and sometimes delicate purposes indicated, I think Congress has the direction of the President. When actually in command for repelling invasion or for any other purpose, he must exercise his own judgment under his constitutional discretion. In one sentence I deny that the President has a right to employ the Army and Navy for suppressing insurrection, &c., without observing the same prerequisites prescribed for him in calling out the militia for the same purpose."

"His suggestion in his message is, that he shall have a right to employ the militia, as he contends he has a right under the Constitution to employ the regular military force—that is, without notice of a proclamation. I do not think he has the right to call out the military force of the Government without observing the prerequisites of the act of 1795, and I am unwilling to give him such power in calling out the militia. I would regard it as a fearfully momentous occasion to see the Army called out to shoot down insurgents without notice or proclamation."

"The truth is, it must be regarded as a significant omen of the times to be told that a marshal, under his plenary power to call out the posse comitatus, cannot execute constitutional laws without resort to force, and that to be executed with the promptness of executive will."

"Justice and the occasion require me to say, that I do not believe the power contended for would be abused by the present Executive. The precedent for the direction of a mild and just President may be the rod of power for a military despot. A. P. BUTLER."

"FEBRUARY 28, 1851."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, this report did not materially differ from the report of the majority. I have seen it adverted to by the newspapers, and generally, I think, the report has been approved. If I had been influenced by feelings of sectional resentment, I might have been tempted to yield to the President's demands. The import of his message was, that he should be allowed not only to use the regular army, without proclamation, in putting down insurrections and bodies of men too formidable to be overcome by the ordinary posse comitatus of the country, but he required that there should be an armed militia at the disposal of his marshals, with bayonets and balls, who should put down those formidable bodies of men, without warning them—without having the riot act read to them at all. I did not agree to any such suggestion. I recollect that under the influence of the highly eloquent appeal which was made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] not now in his seat, this body was prepared almost for any law, and to adopt almost any suggestion. I recollected, however, that what might be urged as the precedent of to-day, might be the prescription of to-morrow, and the same principles which would prevail if his recommendation had been assented to in this case, might be abused by any arbitrary tyrant.

I made no allusion to the precedent as a means to overcome the liberties and institutions of the country. I say now, that if the fugitive slave law is to be enforced by the bayonet—by an armed posse comitatus, put at the disposal of the Executive—it is an evidence that it is a law which will not be enforced at all. I believe that it will not—I believe that it has not been enforced. And in this Republic, when it is necessary that the bayonet should be used instead of voluntary submission to the dominion of the law by the citizens themselves, or by the ordinary force which can be evoked on the occasion to carry it into effect, it is a significant omen, and indicative of the times. Why, I read of these riots and these combinations being denounced as treason. I did not believe, at the time, that they would be construed so as to amount to treason against the United States. Whatever might be their real character, such would not be their complexion in the courts. The character of such meetings will depend more on the testimony of witnesses than the truth of facts, and no authority can overcome such influences. We have a great many rhetorical declamations in this Senate; and if the advertisements which go out from here were to indicate anything like the truth, there would be very little difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the Constitution. But the Constitution is a dead letter. United States courts have no jurisdiction over the subject, for it is not regarded as treason. It is referred to the State courts. What will be the result? The State courts take jurisdiction of this resistance of the fugitive slave law as of an ordinary riot or murder. Who are to decide upon the crime? A jury composed, perhaps, of those who sympathize with the person charged. Who is to award the punishment? The judge who, perhaps, entertains the same feelings, and indulges in the same sympathies. Or, if a tribunal could be found—which I never expect to see—stern enough, in defiance of public opinion, to do justice, under the sanction of an oath, to the obligations of the Constitution, the sentence would be remitted by the Executive of almost any one of the non-slaveholding States.

Gentlemen preach to me eternally that this fugitive slave law will be executed, when every newspaper brings a refutation of the assertion. Have we not arrived at an eventful period in the history of the country? When I see that, by combinations, by contrivances, by legislative enactments, one of the solemn articles of the Constitution—for the fugitive slave law is nothing but an affirmation and recognition of the Constitution—is not only violated, but even put under the ban of the pulpit, let the gentleman not tell me that we are to put bayonets at the disposal of an Executive to enforce any such law. Let the gentleman not lay that flattering unction to his soul. I know that the people may be addressed, and that parties may make excuses and patched-up platforms, for the purpose of concealing the truth from the public mind; but it cannot be done.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Lest I should have misunderstood the gentleman, I will ask him whether we are to understand him as just now announcing the opinion, that armed opposition on the part of citizens of a country, for the purpose of arresting the execution of the fugitive slave law, would not amount to treason?

Mr. BUTLER. I said no such thing. I know the difference between riot and treason. It would be treason to levy war against the United States, if there had been a concerted movement of a public kind to defeat the execution of a law, or of the Constitution, it would amount to treason. But these riots which break out suddenly for a private end—the release of a fugitive slave from his master—would be construed to amount to mere riot, and would not be held to be treason. And I said, too, that if a judge would award proper punishment, the Governor of the State would remit it, Mr. BRODHEAD. Not in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. I have a right to appeal to the Senate upon another subject in connection with this. The Senator from Mississippi vehemently urges the necessity of having statutory or legislative enactments for the ratification of this compromise. He may take either one of the horns of the dilemma. The gentleman was either opposed to some of the points of the compromise when they were under consideration, or he was in favor of them. I do not care which he takes. If he says he was opposed to some one of the propositions involved in the compromise, he must allow me to take his authority; and if, on that occasion, he denounced and was opposed to it, I have a right at least to expect from him some indulgence toward those who agreed with him on that occasion. If, on the contrary, the gentleman was in favor of the compromises, he surely will not take the position that he was "rowing one way and looking another,"—that he gave us his voice by a simple monosyllable of aye or no, when he gave his heart and hand to those who were forcing the measure on. He must take one or the other. He cannot escape it. He was either opposed to the admission of California, and opposed to the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or he was in favor of those two measures. For, as regards the fugitive slave law, of which so much has been said, it was not a part of the original compromise. I take it that the record must speak upon this subject. Here are his votes: and how does the gentleman stand in the parliamentary mirror? He stands opposed to the admission of California, upon the ground that it was a precedent not to be found in the political history of this country. If I remember right, at one time he denounced Executive interference for the procurement of the admission of California. I need not go through all the gentleman's speeches in support of this view, because they are too various; but I wish to go through this fairly. The gentleman said that California had been admitted under circumstances under which no other State had been admitted—in violation of all precedent; and in the next breath he says, why do the enemies of the compromise denounce this measure? He undertakes to vindicate California, and say that she came into the Union just like any other State. At another time he admitted that she came in in violation of all precedent; and at the next moment, he says she was admitted in the same manner as any other State was admitted into the Union.

Allow me to say, that although California has been admitted against my judgment, and in opposition to my will and vote, I have met her representatives here with all respect and kindness, and entertain for them entire friendship. I urged the constitutional objection as well as I could in the speeches made at the time, with great respect and deference to those who differed from me. I do not intend to repeat them. Whatever may have been the operation of that measure—and I think it may operate differently from the intention—the doctrine was proclaimed before her admission, and some of those who voted for it, assumed to do so on the ground that not another slave State should be admitted into this Union. Mr. Webster, with all his annotations and commentaries, has put it forth in that form. The doctrine was avowed and intended to be established by the precedent, that no other slave State should pollute the political association of this Confederacy; and the doctrine, if not avowed, was practically maintained, that the slave States of this Union were not, in a political point of view, equal to the non-slaveholding States. I believe the honorable Senator has exhibited many evidences of a mind sensitive to the honor of his State. Will he tell me that when these doctrines were announced and proclaimed, I was to submit to a system by which war was to be made upon the institutions of that section of the country which I in part represent? I opposed it on this ground, and I believe the honorable Senator did the same. Submit to inequality! Submit that my posterity shall not be equal in political eligibility with the sons of the honorable Senator from New York! [Mr. SEWARD.] Would I consent to the political disfranchisement of my own children? Yet such were the doctrines avowed, and such was the belief entertained as to the operation of that measure. I believe that gentlemen who entertain views of this kind, will be signally disappointed. I hope so, at least. For I believe the institution will continue to go South and West, and California will take it as peculiarly suited to her condition.

Now, let me ask the honorable Senator a question, which I expect him to answer—and I hope he will answer it without the least hesitation: Suppose a proposition were to come up to-morrow to divide California, with the understanding that one portion should be a slave State, or that both should be slave States, would he vote for it?

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I will answer by citing past history, if the gentleman will allow me. I introduced two propositions on the subject myself while this matter was pending, for neither of which, according to my recollection, I had the gentleman's support, or that of his political associates in this body. On the contrary, both of those propositions received the fiercest denunciation from that quarter. When the proposition to admit California was pending, I moved to amend the bill so that California should be hereafter, with her consent, so divided as you, Mr. President, had previously proposed she should be. Upon consultation with you, [Mr. KING,] I took the line which is proposed in the amendment, for the reasons you stated. I did not get the support I anticipated; and I will be prepared to show hereafter, from the printed debates, what reasons were given by honorable gentlemen for not voting for that very proposition. I subsequently introduced another proposition, that California should be, with her consent, divided by that line, and that a territorial government should be established south of it. The objection, then, of certain gentlemen who called themselves, par excellence, State-rights men, was the supposition that they imagined my amendment to convey that California, not yet admitted, in their judgment, validly into the Union, should be treated with so much respect as to have her consent to this territorial curtailment asked. That also was voted down. Whenever any gentleman introduces a proposition here to divide California with her consent, by the line of 36° 30', or 35° 30', treating her in all these respects as a sovereign State, I shall vote for it, and some of those who will vote for it in connection with me will vote in a manner wholly repugnant to their former feelings.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator admits that while he wishes to make the compromise immutable, he is perfectly willing to change it when it suits him. This is a "finality of a totality."

Mr. FOOTE. I should vote for that proposition in the same way that I should vote for a proposition to alter the boundary lines of any other State in the Union at her request. I would not vote for that sooner than a proposition to divide Texas or New York, if those States desire a new State to be formed within their limits. While I hold the compromise to be a definitive settlement, I do not hold it to be above the Constitution, and the Constitution expressly gives Congress the power of admitting new States. Now, perhaps, the gentleman is entitled to the triumph which he claims.

Mr. BUTLER. I claim no triumph. The gentleman's own explanation shows where he considers the triumph is. While he insists on these compromise laws being like unto the laws of the Medes and Persians, so perfect as not to be changed, yet he admits there are contingencies on which they may be changed. That is what I intended to say. It is so wise now that he does not choose to let anybody consult the progressive improvements and suggestions of time; but he wishes to stich down and pin everybody else to his propositions, upon the ground that the Procrustean bed, whether shorter or longer, is the only true measure for the country. I shall put another proposition to the gentleman, and shall expect him to answer that too.

Mr. FOOTE. I will answer as many as the gentleman chooses to put to me, if he will only allow me an opportunity of answering them fully. Some gentlemen never answer any questions I put to them, but I challenge the propounding of questions from any adversary.

Mr. BUTLER. The honorable Senator in his speech referred to the resolutions of the Mississippi Convention. I wish to ask him a question, and I do not wish a disquisition in reply. I observe that the Mississippi Convention have resolved that there is no other remedy for abuse of the Constitution but revolutionary resistance; that there is no right in any one of the members of the Confederacy to resist the Government and form a new government except they incur the penalties of treason and rebellion against the Federal Constitution. The gentleman has chosen to denounce, in no measured language, the State of South Carolina. Now, I think he will find himself in a dilemma from which he cannot escape if he answer the question I now propound. The Mississippi Convention has said that for an interference with slavery in the States—interference with the commerce in slaves between States—the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia—the repeal of the fugitive slave law—the abolition of slavery in the Territories, would constitute a ground for the dissolution of their connection with the Federal Government; and that for these causes which they have assigned, they would dissolve by revolutionary resistance their connection with this Government. Now, the gentleman must be placed in this situation: Suppose Mississippi, for any of these causes, or all of them, should determine upon quitting this Union, or assume a position in which her connection could no longer be continued, and the gentleman was called upon to take sides with Mississippi or the Federal Government, which would he prefer?

Mr. FOOTE. I shall reply in due season if the gentleman will give me an opportunity, but in the first place I must tell him that I consider it insulting to the State which I represent here, which has always proved true to the Constitution, to put her in any such predicament as that described. Never will the State of Mississippi, in my opinion, be in such a position as to call on any of her sons to make war upon the Federal Government; and when she shall do so, I shall deliberate the question and decide according to my sense of propriety. I acknowledge my respect, my profound respect, for what I deem the supreme law of the land, and those who do not, in my opinion are traitors wherever found.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, then, the gentleman, in a contest between Mississippi and the Federal Government, would consider himself a traitor if he were to fight against the Federal banner.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman may make his own commentary; I shall state my views in full hereafter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mississippi here meant something or she meant nothing. If these causes were appended to the gentleman's resolution, I presume he would go for them or against them. What is the supreme law of the land of which he speaks? I say the settled doctrine of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and I believe of Georgia and of Alabama, would be, that this is a confederacy of sovereign States, and not a consolidated Government, which has the exclusive right to decide upon the duty of its members. I know there are questions of perplexity, and the gentleman might take time to consider; but I know where my allegiance will be in a contest of that kind. I would not stop to chop logic on the construction of papers when my hearth and fireside are invaded and I am called upon to defend them. If my blood is to be spilt in a contest between my State and the Federal Government, I would not take time to deliberate, as the gentleman says he would, where my allegiance was due. The impulse of my heart, and the dictates of a judgment long and deliberately formed, would mark out my path of duty.

Another of the topics upon which the Senator from Mississippi dwelt. He said he would never consent to have the Constitution of the United States amended—he said he wanted no amendment to the Constitution of Washington. Why, sir, the Constitution itself, with the wisdom that characterized its original organization, provides for amendments. My deliberate opinion is, that if amendments had been made to answer the exigencies and progressive development of this country, we would have been a happy Confederation of Republics, under a union having satisfactory guarantees for the rights and interests of all; but, instead of amending it according to the original provision of the Constitution, we have now got to a time when it is declared that it shall never be amended. And I would say to the gentleman frankly, that I can see no occasion why he should wish it amended. He has not said that he is in favor of a consolidated government, but he has maintained that this Government and the Constitution, in all the difficulties which may be involved, may be overcome by compromises—the compromises of the majority; and if the gentleman chooses always to act with the majority, he has no occasion for amendments.

Mr. FOOTE. Does the gentleman undertake to charge me with having said, at any time, that the Constitution of the United States could, in my opinion, be put down by compromises?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. FOOTE. That is the way the gentleman's remarks will be understood. I stated the other day, that one of two reasons why I supported the compromise was, that it was not only constitutional in itself, but that none of the constitutional lawyers of this body had attempted to make an elaborate argument to this when they were challenged to attempt it.

Mr. BUTLER. I say that as long as the majority can make these compromises or give constructions to the Constitution, it will not be amended, and the gentleman is emphatically a majority man. I did not say that the gentleman would agree to what he regarded as a palpable violation of the Constitution, but I said the tendency of this mode of treating the Constitution was to have these excrescences in the form of compromises to give it a validity which it would not otherwise have. I think we ought to meet the crisis and provide a remedy.

The gentleman says that I have proposed no amendment. True, I have proposed none, but there are amendments which I will vote for. When the Federal Constitution was under consideration in Philadelphia, it was proposed that no measure affecting the regulation of commerce, or the disbursement of the public money, should pass without a vote of two thirds; and I tell the gentleman that I would now vote for such a provision. If an amendment was proposed to afford new guarantees to the slaveholding interest, requiring Congress to give governments to Territories, without restriction as to slavery, I should vote for it. If I were to consult the security of this Government, I would vote for amendments that would give enforceable guarantees to the minority, and not leave the majority to fritter it away by construction, or deform it by compromises. There are many salutary amendments that might be proposed.

In connection with this subject—and I say it to the Senator from Mississippi, more in sorrow than in anger—I wish he had not thought proper to allude, as he did, with rather a sneer, to the book of my late distinguished colleague, and to denounce the proposition contained in that book in a way which evidently showed that it was under the ban of his censure. I was not prepared for that. I have not read Mr. Calhoun's book. His memory is not committed to me, neither are the works of his great intellect committed to me. I would not be able to take care of them; but the least we could have expected of those who often agreed with and admired that distinguished man was, that we should not assail him before the world, and the Parliament of the nation, where the gentleman himself had so many, and seeming kindly, associations with him.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman does not charge me with ever having agreed with Mr. Calhoun that the Constitution should be amended, so as to give additional constitutional guarantees to the South? I protested against that during his life.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say that.

Mr. FOOTE. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. BUTLER. I said that the gentleman frequently agreed with, and was a great admirer of, Mr. Calhoun.

Mr. FOOTE, (in his seat.) On some questions I did agree with him, but on most I did not.

The PRESIDENT. The conversation must not go on in that way. The Senator is always at liberty to make an explanation, with the consent of the gentleman having the floor, but he is not at liberty to sit in his chair to make comments while the speaker is going on.

Mr. FOOTE. I understand my duty as well as the Chair can inform me.

Mr. BUTLER. I am inclined to think that injustice has been done, perhaps unintentionally, to my late distinguished colleague; and perhaps some newspaper correspondents may make out of it something tributary to the state of the public mind. I think, however, that the book is not in danger from such commentaries, or any that can be made upon it by the Senator. They will not add to nor take from its merits. They may, it is true, make false impressions, for the time, upon superficial minds, who look not into the book itself; but those who are capable of appreciating it, and seek after the truth, will read for themselves, and form an enlightened and honest judgment. It is not true, as the honorable Senator has said, that Mr. Calhoun thought there should be two Executives with the same powers. He is a historian, and he knows very well that there were two Consuls in Rome, with a Tribune to control them. By a partition of power, and such control of it by the tribunitial veto on occasion, the Roman Republic moved on with success and energy. I presume that Mr. Calhoun might very well have entertained the idea that two Presidents might be very well: one perhaps having jurisdiction of foreign and the other of domestic affairs, or some such partition of duties. I presume he intended that each should be independent in his own sphere, and that no law should be passed without the concurrence of both. I am very sure that such a proposition as that, if ingrafted on the Constitution, might give it a better operation than it now has under the combination of interest and numbers. I do not undertake to be the expounder of Mr. Calhoun's views, nor do I say that I am prepared to adopt them. I am sure the gentleman has not done justice to them. I do not enter into the views of Mr. Calhoun; for he never mentioned the subject to me in his lifetime, and I have not yet had an opportunity, and I regret it, to read his book. I only noticed the remark of the gentleman, in passing, with a view to show that in some respects his interpretation of the book might not be the interpretation of everybody. There are other minds besides his to look at the subject; and when a great work of the kind is to be measured, it must be measured by an enlightened public opinion after full discussion upon the subject.

Sir, I have touched upon these things with regret. The Senator from Mississippi is in favor of the compromise; and he denounces, in no measured terms, all those opposed to it; not that the gentleman seems to be governed by unkind feelings to many embraced in the sweep of his censure.

Mr. FOOTE. I have here, elsewhere, and everywhere, wherever I have attempted to speak of the struggle which occurred in the two Houses of Congress, in reference to the questions contained in the plan of compromise, said, uniformly and emphatically, that, so far as the conduct of Senators and Representatives was concerned in that struggle, I had no censures whatever to bestow; nor that I wished them to be censured in any shape or form by any patriotic man in the country. The President of this body knows what my views on this subject were, for we have talked together. All that I have said was, that now, when these measures have become the law of the land; now that the great experiment of compromise was in course of trial, I did conceive that it was the duty of all parties, North and South, to make a fair experiment of those measures, and not to engage in violent agitations against any feature of them. I have simply condemned all attempts at the North, or at the South, at this time, to break up the compromise. But I have never undertaken to condemn any man, or set of men, for decent, zealous, patriotic opposition to any of the measures of adjustment which they themselves disapproved at the time. This is, and always has been, my attitude on that subject.

Mr. BUTLER. That may be; but the gentleman knows as well as any one here, that no one had greater influence—perhaps I may say that he had uncommon influence—in getting up the Southern Address; he was the prime mover of it. And I think the gentleman must, to some extent, assume the responsibility of the Nashville Convention. I say that, after the position which that gentleman has occupied, justice, if not generosity, requires that he should at least look to the motives, which I hope he will, of other persons who are disposed to stand up to the propositions which they avowed at the time in the Southern Address. I supposed it was a matter of historical interest to the gentleman. And now I will say here, for the first time, what I have heretofore said to my friends, that the Nashville Convention was premature. My friends know that this was my opinion. If there is one gentleman in this hall who has contributed fuel to the fires of Southern resistance and indignation, the honorable Senator has fed them as freely as any other. I am not now making any accusations against him for mere change of opinion and position. I have said nothing at all, nor will I say anything, in reference to a man's course, when he changes it; but when the Senator from Mississippi thought proper to speak of South Carolina, and allude to her internal contests, the least, in my opinion, that delicacy or propriety could require of him, was to forbear unkind allusions to her course, and especially to abstain from availing of his own change of doctrine and position to give point to those allusions. The mass of those who, in South Carolina, were for putting her in advance of what I regarded the position she should occupy, are persons whose motives and designs would place them before the tribunal of history in a point of view far above reach of the gentleman's arrow. They are as high in spirit, as pure in motive, and would be as brave in action, as any men who ever adorned the pages of history. I differed from friends in South Carolina; but here, I cannot allow that difference to prevent my doing them justice, if they required it at my hands.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. If the honorable gentleman had read my speech as reported, or if he distinctly recollected what I said the other day, he would certainly find himself effectually relieved from the necessity of making the remarks which he has just made. I stated distinctly that I entertained a high respect for the people of the State of South Carolina. I expressed the high gratification which I felt, that the real people of South Carolina had come nobly to the rescue of the honor of the State in the contest lately in progress there between them and certain demagogues. I hoped that the people there, under the lead of the honorable gentleman and such as he, would vanquish the demagogues in that struggle. That is what I said. I did not denounce the Legislature of South Carolina. I did not denounce any organized body of men there, Legislature or Convention. If I have any particular sentiments unfavorable to such bodies, I withheld them; but I did denounce, and I shall continue to denounce, any man or set of men in South Carolina, who dared to urge the people of that State to attack the forts of the United States within her limits—to make war upon the General Government—and who dared to say, perverting the language of the immortal Henry, "I say we must fight." I did denounce such persons, and not those who were inclined to arm the State for her own defence against the General Government, in the event of an unjust attack neither menaced nor expected. I did denounce persons who, as I am prepared to prove by their speeches, attempted, without any aggression on the part of the General Government, to incite the people of South Carolina to an immediate attack upon the Government. These are the men that I denounced, and I am responsible here and elsewhere, for the strongest language used in decrial of them. I shall always decry them.

Mr. BUTLER. If I had not been interrupted I should have gone on and stated, perhaps, what the gentleman could not have taken exception to, so far as I am concerned. I have not said anything in a personal point of view, but I must do my duty to others.

Mr. FOOTE. If the gentleman chooses to defend such men, he can do it.

Mr. BUTLER. South Carolina, in her first resolutions of 1848, proposed nothing but coöperation with the other States. In 1849, in the mildest terms, she proposed the same thing. In 1850—I say it upon my responsibility in this Chamber—she called her convention in reference to a course projected and intimated by the State of Mississippi. I cannot be mistaken in that. Is it just that any reproach should attach to her from a representative of Mississippi?

There were many things well calculated to aggravate the popular excitement and indignation at the course of the General Government. Whilst the people were deliberating on their condition, and the course the State should pursue, the Administration showed both a want of wisdom and decency. For what purpose some troops were sent to the forts in Charleston is not distinctly understood. The effect was to arm all parties with a determination to resent the insulting demonstration; and it was difficult for her public men to restrain excitement and control consequences. That movement has left an abiding impression on the public mind. There was not the slightest occasion for troops, and if one drop of blood had been shed, there would have been a civil war that would have put the questions now in debate under the arbitrament of the sword. The gentleman might have found it a difficult task to have found enough constables to hang the traitors. He would have been consumed in his own State if he had made a demonstration against South Carolina. The issue would have been far above party strife or rhetorical display.

I cannot go further into this subject, except to express my opinion that injustice has been done to those of South Carolina who have attempted to conform to the suggestions of Mississippi; not altogether under the counsels of the honorable Senator, but yielding very much to influence which his counsels and those of others had. Therefore

I think such an allusion as he made was entirely unnecessary.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I will not now ask the gentleman to allow me to explain, because I have interrupted him so often. Yet, if it would make no difference to him, I would go on now to explain the attitude of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is at liberty to proceed.

Mr. FOOTE. I shall explain more fully hereafter. I wish now simply to protest against what the gentleman has said in regard to the course and attitude of the State of Mississippi. It is true I signed the Southern Address; and I now approve every word contained therein. It is true, I did forward a letter from Mr. Calhoun to my own State which proposed the holding of the Nashville Convention, and which marked out to some extent the then expected modus operandi of that body. It is true, also, as I have heretofore asserted, that not one single word is contained in that Southern Address or in Mr. Calhoun's letter which recommends secession, or intimates that there should be any amendment to the Constitution. The State of Mississippi was willing to meet, in a proper manner and a truly patriotic spirit, the citizens of the rest of the slaveholding States of this Union in the Nashville Convention, for the purpose of fraternal consultation, in regard to the means most proper to be adopted for guarding against certain dangers with which we were then menaced—one of which was the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; another of which was the attempt to impose the Wilmot proviso. I will not reiterate all the measures with which we had been then menaced for some years, and to which the Southern Address, in the most solemn manner, called the attention of the South; to guard against which the State of Mississippi, under advice received from South Carolina through me, in the manner I have described, was willing to send delegates to a Southern Convention. I will add, though, that it was doubtless one of our objects in this movement, to secure our long-withheld right to an efficient congressional enactment providing for the recapture and restoration of fugitives from service. But I reiterate, that we did not commit ourselves to secession, nor did we insist on amending the Federal Constitution.

I will say further to the honorable gentleman, that the State of Mississippi, as she was justified in doing, came to the conclusion, gravely and deliberately—and I believe all dispassionate men will admit that she acted wisely in coming to that conclusion—that the plan of compromise effectually guarded against every single danger with which the South had been antecedently menaced, and secured to her the fugitive slave law, to which she was entitled by the Constitution, in addition, together with certain other incidental advantages, some of which I endeavored to point out the other day. Now if, in the opinion of the State of Mississippi, the compromise has operated in a manner so comprehensively beneficial, how can it be contended that the State of South Carolina, when she undertook, without just reason, to manifest dissatisfaction with the acts of adjustment, and proposed a Southern Congress for the purpose of arraying the Southern States against them, was led into that attitude by the State of Mississippi? I have heard that said before, and I have denied it. Had the wise monitions of the parent Convention of Mississippi been adopted by the Nashville Convention, the South would have had no further trouble. I believe this advice would have been adopted and acted upon, but for certain intriguing politicians, who attempted, in my opinion, in bad faith—of which I shall give the proofs hereafter—to wield the machinery of the National Convention, gotten up for very different purposes, for the overthrow of the Union; a very ingenious plan having been adopted, under the advice of certain persons who have openly avowed themselves subsequently to have been secret disunionists in heart and design at that time, in demanding terms of settlement so extravagant and unreasonable as to make all hope of their ultimate adoption utterly absurd.

One of the leaders of South Carolina, a gentleman who is reputed to be the author of the Nashville Address, declared, as I well recollect, in a speech delivered in Charleston, immediately after his return from the Nashville Convention, that he had entertained no expectation when the celebrated demand of 36° 30' was made on the part of the Convention, that it would be acceded to; but that he, for many years past, had been tired of the Union and anxious to break it up, and expected, through the agency of the Nashville Convention, and by demanding terms of adjustment which would not be acceded to by Congress and the Northern States, to accomplish his long-cherished object. This noted avowal, I say, was made in Charleston after the session of the Convention had drawn to a close; but that gentleman cannot deny that he had been quite particular in not declaring such views and objects in the Nashville Convention. All will perceive from this statement that the honorable Senator [Mr. BUTLER] has entirely misunderstood the true position of the State of Mississippi, and I hope not hereafter to hear her accused of being instigated by any portion of the extravagant movements of certain factionists in South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I have only said that South Carolina, to some extent, shaped her course according to the plan marked out by the State of Mississippi. The Senator has made allusions which cannot be mistaken. I must, therefore, in justice to my colleague, yield the floor, to allow him an opportunity of speaking, although there is much more which I would have said, but for the frequent interruptions with which the course of my remarks has been broken in upon, and the allusions to my colleague which it is but justice he should have an opportunity to notice.

Mr. RHETT next addressed the Senate until past the usual hour of adjournment, when, without finishing, he yielded the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 15, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

The Journal of Thursday was read and approved.

Mr. STRATTON was appointed by the Speaker to fill the vacancy in the Committee of Elections, in the place of Mr. DISNEY, who was excused from service on said committee.

Mr. CULLOM, of Tennessee, and Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, appeared, were qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution, and took their seats.

LOUIS KOSSUTH.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the passage by that body of "A joint resolution of welcome to Louis Kossuth."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution calling upon the President for information.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it in order now, Mr. Speaker, to move a suspension of the rules, to consider the resolution from the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. BAYLY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON,] that I have no intention of being in the way of the resolution concerning Kossuth. My resolution is simply one asking important information from the President; and to which I presume there will be no objection.

IMPRISONMENT OF MR. THRASHER.

There being no objection, the resolution was reported to the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, so far as in his judgment may be compatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House any information in possession of the Executive respecting the imprisonment, trial, and sentence of John S. Thrasher, in the Island of Cuba, and to his right to claim the protection of the Government, as a native-born citizen of the United States.

The question was then put, and the resolution was adopted.

WELCOME TO LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up the resolution of welcome to Kossuth. I shall also ask that it be put upon its passage.

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then read the first and second times by its title.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move that the resolution be put upon its passage; and upon that motion I ask the previous question.

Cries of "Read the resolution."

The resolution was read, as follows:

A Joint Resolution of welcome to Louis Kossuth.

Resolved, That Congress, in the name and behalf of the people of the United States, give to Louis Kossuth a cordial welcome to the capital and the country; and that a copy of this resolution be transmitted to him by the President of the United States.

The question now being upon ordering the resolution to a third reading,

Mr. ROBINSON called for the previous question.

Cries of "That's right!" "Let's have the previous question!"

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; and being put, was carried in the affirmative.

The resolution was then read a third time.

The question now being, "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. RICHARDSON moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, asked the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution; which were ordered; and being taken, were—yeas 181, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, Barrere, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bell, Bennett, Bibbhausa, Boccock, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Breckenridge, Breton, Briggs, Brooks, Buell, Burrows, Busby, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, Geo. T. Davis, J. G. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Edgerton, Evans, Faulkner, Picklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Gorman, Grey, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hays, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henu, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Geo. G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullen, McNair, McQueen, Meacham, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Oids, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Geo. W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Yates—181.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Averett, Bragg, Albert G. Brown, Caldwell, Isham G. Harris, Holladay, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Martin, Morehead, Savage, Scurry, Alexander H. Stephens, Williams, and Woodward—16.

So the resolution passed.

Mr. McMULLIN, when his name was called, said he should vote for the resolution, though with great reluctance. [Great laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay that motion on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the title of the resolution; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH. I rose for the same purpose. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, by which the title of the resolution was adopted, and I ask if upon that motion I cannot submit a few remarks on the merits of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. Debate upon that question must be confined to the merits of the title of the resolution, and the reasons for its reconsideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether there was a division upon the question of adopting the title? If there was no division, then I have no question to make.

The SPEAKER. There was no division.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I have no question to make.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the Clerk to read the title of the resolution and the resolution.

Mr. CARTTER. I object to the reading of the resolution. That is not now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to order the reading of the resolution. The question, therefore, is, Shall the resolution be read?

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1851.

NEW SERIES.....No. 7.

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!" and "Yes!" from all parts of the Hall.]

Mr. EVANS. I submit to the Chair that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] has the right to demand that the resolution shall be read. If he has the right to discuss the merits of the title, and its pertinency to the resolution, I desire to know how he can show its pertinency without having the resolution read?

Mr. SMITH. If the House will but listen to me for two minutes—

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

[Cries of "Hear him!" "Hear him!" and great confusion in the Hall.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. SMITH. The notice which I gave the other day of resolutions I intended to introduce into this House, has placed me in a most extraordinary position before the country, and has rendered it necessary for me to make some explanation as to their object and the reason for their introduction. That is my only object for now asking the indulgence of the House.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know of the Chair if the gentleman is proceeding in order?

[Cries of "Don't interrupt him!" "Let's hear him!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is in order. The Chair cannot anticipate what application the gentleman intends to make with his remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Alabama rises to explain. Now, since I have been a member of this House, the privilege of personal explanation has not been refused once, and I hope it will not be refused to the gentleman from Alabama.

Several MEMBERS. Certainly not.

Mr. CARTTER. It is not my desire to object to the gentleman's making a personal explanation, but—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Alabama has not transgressed the rules of legitimate debate.

Mr. CARTTER. But I understand that the gentleman's intention is, to discuss the merits of the resolution itself. He has the right only to discuss its title.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell what application the gentleman will make of his remarks. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. SMITH. I merely wish to explain my position. If the House will indulge me, I will get through in the time which gentlemen will consume with their interruptions. I believe I have the right to address the House upon this question, and I also ask it as a matter of courtesy. I desire to show, that at the time I gave notice of my intention to offer these resolutions, there were really grounds upon which they were properly based. Well, sir, I cannot get at this without going to some extent into the merits of the resolution just adopted, and also, to some extent, into the merits of the whole Kossuth question. I do not say that I have that right.

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Alabama will allow the Chair to say, that he has not now the right to discuss the resolutions of which he gave notice the other day, unless the House grant him leave; neither is it in order to discuss the main body of the resolution, except so far as it is necessary to inquire whether the title ought or ought not to be adopted.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise for the purpose of propounding this interrogatory to the Chair: I desire to know whether it is in order to move that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] have leave to explain?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to grant leave, if the rules are suspended for that purpose.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order, then, to move a suspension of the rules for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I move that the rules of the House be suspended, in order to allow the gentleman from Alabama an opportunity for explanation.

Mr. CARTTER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GENTRY. I believe, according to previous usage, the House have the right to grant leave upon a mere motion. I move that the gentleman from Alabama have leave to explain, so far as he thinks it necessary for his own vindication.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Tennessee has anticipated me. I intended to have made the same motion.

The question was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

So leave was granted.

Mr. SMITH. I thank my friend from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] for the motion to suspend the rule, in order to allow me the fuller opportunity of explanation. I noticed, when he voted, that he remarked, that he doubted the propriety of that vote. I am satisfied he will agree with my views. The course, Mr. Speaker, which has been taken upon this resolution presents to the country a most extraordinary spectacle. A few days ago, when it was introduced into one end of this Capitol, we hear, it met with so slight favor that its projector [Mr. FOOTE]—a man of indomitable zeal and energy—thought proper to withdraw it, under the frowns of opposition. At that time the "Star of the East" had not arisen; at that time Kossuth had not appeared, and popular commotion had not been aroused in the country; at that time the mob power had not begun to be exercised. But since then a most astonishing change has come over our legislators; a resolution, though not in the same terms, yet looking to the same object, has been introduced in the Senate, and that body passed it with but six dissenting voices. Is that legislating within the walls of this Capitol, beyond the influence of popular commotion, or is it not, rather, the public outside these walls who make the law, and pass the resolution? But what do we see in this House? We see this same resolution brought forward here, at the hour of twelve o'clock, and before a remark could be made the previous question was called; that question was sustained, and the resolution passed. When I reached my seat I found the House voting upon the passage of the resolution, and was forced to vote in favor of it, in order that I might move a reconsideration, and thereby be enabled to make the remarks which I think so important to me.

Mr. CARTTER. I rise to a question of order. The question submitted to the House was, "Shall the gentleman from Alabama have leave to make a personal explanation?" That was the question submitted to the House, and the one upon which the House acted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is just what he is doing.

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says that is what he was doing. I do not understand what this personal explanation is, then, if it will allow the gentleman to start off with a general attack upon Kossuth, and this body, for passing the Kossuth resolution. If I understand the force and connection of his remarks, instead of being a personal explanation of the gentleman from Alabama, it is a reflection upon the whole House and its character, and particularly upon the friends of this resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call the gentleman from Ohio to order.

Mr. CARTTER. Well, that is the point of order I make.

Mr. SMITH. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] is a little fuller of a speech to-day than I am. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that, in his opinion, the gentleman from Alabama has not transgressed the privilege granted him by the House.

Mr. SMITH. It is impossible for me to make the explanation I wish, without going into the merits of the controversy, and I will proceed to do it in brief. I will begin by looking upon Kossuth, standing, as he does, a man banished from his country—as an exile. Now, it is thought by some persons to be the greatest evil that can happen to man to be banished from his country; but this is not always the fact. The extent of the misfortune depends upon circumstances—the country from which he is banished, its situation, its wealth, poverty, its laws, and the home condition of the party banished at the time. Indeed, it is not always a misfortune.

I remember that Diogenes counterfeited coin in order that he might be banished from Pontus. I remember that Stragoniscus committed forgery in order that he might be banished from Straphos. They thought that to be banished from such countries was getting out of prison. Now, I think, if these things were applied seriously to the history and present condition of Hungary, that Kossuth might not only not be considered an unfortunate, but, truly, a most fortunate man. We have it, in the story of Themistocles, that when he was banished from Athens he fled to the court of Persia, where he was received with so much graciousness, that the great Monarch of Persia set apart for him six cities; one for his wine, one for his meat, one for his bread, one for his chamber, one for his wardrobe, and I suppose another for his kennel. Well, this Themistocles, while living in so much splendor, forgot poor little Athens, and considered himself the happiest of men; and in contemplating the splendor and luxuries with which he had been surrounded, he was led to lay his hands upon the heads of his children, and exclaim, "Ah! my children, we would have been undone, but for our undoing!" Happy Themistocles! Now, let us look at the man Kossuth again. There he stands, before the American people, welcomed as no man was ever welcomed before. Private assemblies and public assemblies, private mansions and public mansions are opened to receive him. Military chieftains and municipal authorities attend him with all the pomp and circumstance of place and power.

"Wine, wit, and beauty still their charms display, Light all the shades of life and cheer him on his way."

Happy, happy Kossuth! And, in addition to this, it seems to be a part of his mission—and I intend to go into the merits of that mission, in order to sustain my resolution—to ask for money. Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with my resolution, I propose to present him to this House as coming here to raise money. That was part of his business. We are told by his friends that he was detained in England, and did not arrive on our shores as soon as was expected, because he was there to arrange and provide for the wants of his associates, by a subscription, got up for them in London.

I see in his last speech in New York he unrolls a little magical scroll there, which gives him a great deal of pleasure, and which seemed to be a source of great pleasure to his audience—that dinner party—that great dinner party, which I suppose is to control, as the pulse of public sentiment, Congress as well as the sentiments of the whole American people. It is wise to remember that the sober second thought comes, not only after dinner, but after digestion.

The little document which he unrolled came from the city of Cincinnati. Why, sir, if Kossuth could but get that city (which is Porkdom,) as one of the six, he certainly might be contented, as much so as Themistocles.

Here it is:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, November 14, 1851.

M. LOUIS KOSSUTH, Governor of Hungary: Sir—I have authorized the office of the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company, in New York, to hand you drafts on me for one thousand dollars.

Respectfully yours,
W. SMEAD.
This was very gratefully received, and the Hungarian exile then proceeded to submit a proposition to raise more money.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire of the Chair, if it is in order, after the House has sustained the previous question, and when the resolution is not before the House, for any member to discuss it in this stage of proceeding. The resolution was put to the House, and a large majority of us voted for its adoption. I ask, therefore, if it is in order for the gentleman from Alabama, under the privilege granted him to make a personal explanation, to speak against the resolution when no one of its friends can be permitted to defend it?

The SPEAKER. The House, by a vote, have given the gentleman from Alabama leave to make a personal explanation. It has been the custom of the House, where such leave has been granted, to allow the largest latitude for debate; and in accordance with that usage, the Chair does not feel at liberty to interrupt the gentleman in his remarks; because it is not in his power to anticipate the application which the member from Alabama might make of the course of remarks he is now pursuing.

Mr. CARTER. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The question was then put upon the motion to lay upon the table, and a division being had, 103 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. STUART demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. FOWLER. I beg the Chair to inform the House of the state of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] was not wandering beyond the limits prescribed by the House, in granting him leave to make a personal explanation. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moves to lay that appeal upon the table; and upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the motion to lay the appeal upon the table. I understand an appeal is debatable, and I desire to make two or three remarks upon it.

Cries of "No! No!"

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I submit this point. After the yeas and nays have been ordered upon a motion, I submit that the mover has no right to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER overruled the question of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit to the Chair, that when an appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair, according to our rules, that appeal must be decided by the House without debate.

Mr. JONES. Where do you get that rule?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is one of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules this point of order also. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to make a statement of the case, as I understand it, in order that the House in overruling the Chair, may not violate the rules of the House—because there may be a spirit here in favor of Kossuth to override all rules, and perhaps all discussion. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] asked leave to make an explanation. It was objected to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (interrupting.) I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order. I ask that the 35th rule be read.

It was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That rule was suspended with the other, in order to permit the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] to make his speech. The gentleman has been abused by the newspapers throughout the country, and it is right that he should have an opportunity of defending his course, [cries of "Order!" "order!"] I repeat that the rule has been suspended. [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion, notwithstanding the rules have been suspended for a particular purpose, that the gentleman from Alabama is subjected to the rules of the House in the course of the remarks which he may make, and that in any question arising on an appeal in this particular case, debate is not in order. The gentleman from Tennessee has withdrawn the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. JONES. I renew the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. CARTER called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table; and there were—yeas 122, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, Barrere, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bell, Bingham, Bissell, Bocoock, Bowne, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Brooks, Baell, Burrows, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Cha-tain, Clark, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Durkee, Edgumson, Enans, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Gable, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Gorman, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hays, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Hildaday, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landrum, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, McCorkle, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morrison, Nabers, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Phelps, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Ross, Savage, Schermerhorn, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smart, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Walbridge, Wallace, Walsh, Watkins, Welch, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—122.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, Babcock, Bartlett, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Cleveland, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Dimmick, Doty, Edgerton, Faulkner, Floyd, Freeman, Grow, Hart, Hubbard, Ingalls, Preston King, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, McDonald, McNair, Meade, Molony, Morehead, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Penn, Perkins, Polk, Price, Robie, Robinson, Sackett, Schoonmaker, Skelton, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, St. Martin, Strother, Stuart, Sweetser, Thurston, Townsend, Washburn, Wells, and Wildrick—58.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. COBB, on his name being called upon the above vote, said: Duty and inclination come in conflict. I should like to vote yea, but my duty compels me to vote "No;" and I therefore do it.

Mr. SMITH then resumed his remarks, and said: To relieve the gentleman who has interrupted me so frequently, I will make this remark, that it is impossible for me to submit the explanation which I design, without vindicating the resolutions which I offered the other day, and I cannot vindicate those resolutions without going into the merits of the controversy. I should, however, have been nearly through by this time, and I trust that I shall not be met by any further interruption.

The fate of the unfortunate fifty who fell in Cuba, whose melancholy end is fresh in the recollection of us all, ought of itself to be sufficient to make the American people and the American Congress pause and make the solemn inquiry whether or not they are ready so soon to invite, to foster, to encourage, and to feast another foreigner—another perturbed, restless political revolutionist?

It is impossible for any one to look this question calmly in the face, without being compelled to see the close similarity between the Lopez expedition and any expedition which could be fitted out in this country in favor of Hungary. We cannot yet assign to Lopez his proper position; I trust that posterity will find in him all the elements of a martyr and of a hero. All we know of him is, that he beguiled the young of the country, and that he deceived the old of the country—not publicly, not by eloquence, but by dinner-table conversation, private understandings, loans and Cuban-bondisms.

Now, sir, this illustrious exile cannot consider that I bring him into contempt, by mentioning his name with that of Lopez. I do not do it with any such intention. I believe that Lopez may find a lofty place in the estimation of posterity. I refer to him merely for the purpose of showing the dangerous influence that this man may exercise in our country at this moment. Every American knows the excitability of the American disposition. At this particular time, so soon after the disbanding of our armies, when the country is so full of those young men who have tasted of war—whose swords have been whetted, whose ambition now has no outlet, no escape; who have no hope except in arms—at this particular time, the exciting speeches of this exile may have upon the country a most disastrous and unfortunate effect. It was to avert these evils that I desired to call the attention of the public officers of the country to him and to his position.

Now let us examine the merits of Kossuth's mission to this country. He told us in his English speeches that his object in coming to the United States was to endeavor to unite England and America in behalf of his country, and to induce us to abandon our old national non-interventionism, and to adopt an "armed non-intervention," as he is pleased to term it. He told us that this was his object. I have his speeches before me, in which he says that one of the objects of his mission to this country is to perfect a union between England and America, and to introduce into our policy a new code of national non-intervention. Here is what he says:

"I suppose it is known now that the policy of England and of the United States can unite; and when they are united, I myself hope that without wars the interests of mankind by that means will be secured."

When I go to the United States, I will consider it to be one of my duties to try if there cannot be an humble opportunity for this union, as I was an humble opportunity for the promulgation of the solidarity sentiment of nations for the principles of liberty."

In that same speech what did he say as to our policy of non-intervention—as to Washington's policy of non-intervention? Why he compliments the Father of his Country for promulgating what he is pleased to term, in his unique phraseology, "the letter-marque of despotism." Washington's policy of non-intervention is, in the idea of Kossuth, "the letter-marque of despotism!" Hear what he says:

"That is the principle—the sovereign right of every nation to dispose of itself. But this is not the non-intervention which would be defined by these words: 'I do not care whatever be the fate of humanity, whatever the disposal of the world may do with Europe or with its liberty, because my principle is non-intervention.' That, I say, is not non-intervention; it is the letter-of-marque to despotism; it would be an assurance to society to carry with certainty the victory to despotism."

Now, sir, when Kossuth arrived in New York he was met there by a Doctor somebody—Hobgoblin, or a name of a similar character—who gave him the following assurances:

"For my part, and I ask no one to be responsible for what I say, although I honestly believe that I speak the sentiments of the great mass of my fellow-countrymen, and especially the sentiments of those three and a half millions of stalwart, able-bodied young men of America whom our laws have designated for military purposes—I believe I speak the sentiments of this great mass of intelligent citizen-soldiers, who are not merely household troops, sir, but who have recently had an opportunity of demonstrating before the world what use they can make of arms in the enemy's country—I speak their sentiments, sir, when I say that the great Kossuth doctrine of armed non-intervention is the doctrine and sentiments of America—non-intervention for us—non-intervention for all."

What does Kossuth say in reply to this? Why, he says:

"The reception I have already experienced relieves me from much anxiety. If the doctrine of non intervention is understood, as you state, then the generous and efficient aid of the United States to my country's suffering independence is gained."

Let us pause a moment at this period. We see that Kossuth stated in England that the object of his mission to this country was to endeavor to unite England and America upon a new principle of non-intervention. When he arrived here he was told that three millions of armed young men were prepared to aid him; that "armed non-intervention" was the doctrine of America; and he then said that the great object of his mission was more than half accomplished.

I propose now to refer to some of the speeches which he made previous to the offering of my resolution. I propose to show that they contained phrases which authorized the resolutions. Recollect that it has been our policy from the very foundation of the Government to stay at home and to attend to our own wars—to our own business—and to let the other nations of the earth do likewise. Recollect, too, that we have adopted a statute which makes it almost treasonable for any man to aid in setting on foot any expedition against any country with which we are at peace.

Now, hear what Kossuth says of his motive in being here at this time:

"The motive, citizens, is that your generous act of my liberation has raised the conviction throughout the world that this generous act of yours is but the manifestation of your resolution to throw your weight into the balance where the fate of the European continent is to be weighed. You have raised the conviction throughout the world, that by my liberation you were willing to say, 'Ye oppressed nations of old Europe's continent, be of good cheer; the young giant of America stretches his powerful arm over the waves, ready to give a brother's hand to your future.' So is your act interpreted throughout the world."

He goes on to say:

"It is hence that my liberation was cheered, from Sweden down to Portugal, as a ray of hope. It is hence that even those nations which most desire my presence in Europe now, have unanimously told me, 'Hasten on, hasten on to the great, free, rich, and powerful people of the United States, and bring over its brotherly aid to the cause of your country, so intimately connected with European liberty.'"

Again, he says:

"And taking my ground on this principle of union, which I find lawfully existing, an established constitutional fact, it is not to a party, but to the united people of the United States that I confidently will address my humble requests for aid and protection to oppressed humanity. I will conscientiously respect your laws, but within the limits of your laws I will use every honest exertion to gain your operative sympathy and your financial, material, and political aid for my country's freedom and independence, and entreat the realization of these hopes which your generosity has raised in me and my people's breasts, and also in the breasts of Europe's oppressed nations. And, therefore, thirdly, I beg leave frankly to state that my aim is to restore my fatherland to the full enjoyment of that act of declaration of independence, which being the only rightful existing public law of my nation."

How is it possible for his fatherland to be restored without war? How could we possibly aid, financially, materially, and politically, without bringing war?

I refer to these speeches to show that my resolutions had some foundation in fact. But in addition to all this, we have another most extraordinary development. Kossuth was invited to review the militia of New York; he was invited to appear before the militia of the country with all the trappings of military gewgawism, no doubt with the privilege of expressing to those men in arms, the same sentiments that he expressed at the other meetings. Here is what he says in reference to that invitation:

"I am told that I will have the high honor to review your patriotic militia. Oh, God! how my heart throbs at the idea to see this gallant army enlisted on the side of freedom against despotism; the world would be free, and you the saviors of humanity."

Now, I ask if there was not some reason for the resolutions which I offered? I ask the House to look at this man, with his powerful eloquence, with his great ingenuity, with his greater character, coming as he does from the fields where liberty's battles were fought and won and lost—I ask the House to view him in his speeches and in his positions, with all its candor, and to say if there was not some grounds of apprehension that those inflammatory harangues would incite the young and the ambitious into an expedition? How long would it take New York, with its immense wealth and shipping resources, to supply and fit out an expedition? It is known that New York was the life, soul, and centre of the ill-starred Cuban expedition.

But I pass on to the general positions which he assumes in some of his other speeches. Was it generous in this man—was it returning our hospitality in a proper manner, to come here and so immediately, so directly, so unblushingly, so unhesitatingly to commence a direct interference in our public and private concerns. What does he say? Not content with receiving the homage of the people in their popular assemblies, he assails Congress and advises us to recall our Minister from Vienna! What a height of impudence is that! He tells us that we can spare Mr. Hulsemann. Here is his language:

"Now, as to your minister at Vienna, how you can combine the letting him stay there with your opinion of the cause of Hungary, I really don't know; but so much I know, that the present absolutist atmosphere of Europe is not very propitious to American principles. I know a man who could tell some curious facts about this matter. But as to Mr. Hulsemann, really I don't believe that he would be so ready to leave Washington. He has extremely well digested the caustic pills which Mr. Webster has administered to him so gloriously."

Now notice the magical skill of this arch elocutionist. See with what ingenuity he mixes the flattery with the censure. Why, he is almost as polished and as ingenious as St. Paul, who, when he pleaded before Agrippa smoothed his way to the King's heart by a magical touch, thus: "I think myself happy, King Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself, this day, before thee, especially because I know thee to be expert in all the questions and customs which are among the Jews." Here, in connection with these slurs upon our Austrian mission, and upon the respectable representative of that Government here, he soft-sawders Mr. Webster, endeavoring, I suppose, to obtain, and no doubt obtaining, by that soft-sawdering, the influence of some of Mr. Webster's friends. But he mistakes the American heart. Our triumphs bring pleasure and delight to us. Our friends rejoice when the victory is over, it is not ours to turn the knife in the wound; we are not cold enough for that. Mr. Webster's triumph in the little matter of diplomacy was very complete over Mr. Hulsemann—very gratifying, very satisfactory. Did Mr. Webster enjoy the pain which it gave his respectable adversary? No. He rejoiced not in the pain he inflicted; but in the intellectual pleasure of looking upon his own bantling—a great little letter! Now, I tell Kossuth that Mr. Webster feels great disgust for this heartless effort to revive an old quarrel, and to insult Mr. Hulsemann by referring to him in words of contempt coupled with a flattering allusion to the Secretary of State. I refer to this for the purpose of asking if it became an exile who had been brought to this country by the mediation of the Government, sanctioned by the people, so soon and so unblushingly to begin his interference in our public as well as our private affairs?

But I must hasten on. This man, in the last speech which he made in New York—to which speech I take no exception whatever—I have no doubt that he had seen or heard of my resolutions before he delivered it, because it is entirely free from the incendiary which marked his former speeches—but in that speech, he says that General Washington never recommended national non-intervention, but only neutrality, and he resorts to a species of fallacious logic by which he endeavors to draw a distinction between "neutrality" and national "non-intervention." Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, what has been our policy. It makes no odds whether Washington recommended it in so many words. His word "neutrality" was quite sufficient, and upon it has been built the policy that has ruled us in all time. And what has been the result of that policy? Why, from the small beginning of three millions of inhabitants, we have now got twenty-three millions; from a small number of States, we are now over thirty; from a ragged population, we present the best dressed population in the world; and from poverty we have risen to the greatest wealth and prosperity. Why and how did we get all these? We got them by an adherence to the great principle of staying at home and minding our own business. It is a principle upon which a private man thrives. It is a principle upon which private families prosper. It is a principle upon which a neighborhood has peace and prosperity and enjoyment. It is that great principle which has raised us up to be the greatest government on earth. But Kossuth says that we may depart from that policy now—that it was wise when we were young, but that now we have grown up to be a giant and may abandon it. Here is another bit of philosophy for you. We can all resist adversity. We know the uses—and sweet are they—of adversity. It is the crucible of fortune. It is the iron key that unlocks the golden gates of prosperity. I say, God bless adversity. It tricks me. I bleed and am well. But the rock upon which men and upon which nations split is PROSPERITY. This man says that we have grown to be a giant and that we may depart from the wisdom of our youth. But I say that now is the time to take care; we are great enough; let us be satisfied; prevent the growth of our ambition, prevent our pride from swelling, and hold on to what we have got. Do you remember the story of the old governor, who had been raised from rags? His King discovered in him merit and integrity, and appointed him a satrap—a ruler over many provinces. He came to be great, and it was his custom to be escorted throughout the country several times during the year, in order to see and to be seen. He was received and acknowledged everywhere as a great man and a great governor. But he carried about with him a mysterious chest, and every now and then he would look into it, but let nobody else see what it contained.

There was a great deal of curiosity excited by this chest; and finally he was prevailed upon by some of his friends to let them look into it. Well, he permitted it, and what did they see? They saw an old ragged and torn suit of clothes, the clothes that he used to wear in his humility and in his poverty, and he said that he carried them about with him in order that when his heart began to swell, and his ambition to rise, and his pride to dilate, he could look on the rags, they reminded him of what he had been, and thus he was enabled to resist the temptations of prosperity. Let us see whether this can illustrate anything in our history. Raise the veil, if there is one, which conceals the poverty of this Union, when there were but thirteen States. Raise the veil that conceals the rags of our soldiers of the Revolution. Lift the lid of the chest which contains the poverty of our beginning, in order that you may be reminded, like this old satrap, of the days of your poverty, and be enabled to resist the advice of this man who now tells you that you were wise in your youth, but that now you are a giant and may depart from that wisdom. Remember now the use of adversity, and let us take advantage of it and be benefited by it, for great is the man, and greater is the nation, that can resist the enchanting smiles of prosperity.

In referring to our humble beginning, and our great and astonishing growth, I am induced to pause a moment, and ask why is it that we should so lightly and carelessly treat propositions of this sort, which involve, as it is admitted this proposition does involve, the very principle by which we have grown to our present condition? What was the cost of this great and glorious Confederacy? We cannot find it by going back and searching the old Quartermaster's reports. We cannot find it in dollars and cents—we know not how to estimate it by this method. The true place to find the cost is in the battle-fields of the Revolution—in the rags, the deprivations, the bleeding feet of your soldiers—the history of those brave men, who fell in their youth. In this contemplation, I cannot arrive at an estimate of the cost of these States. Now, I ask, if it is wise in this legislative assembly so lightly and carelessly to pass by the wisdom of our fathers?

In reference to this question of non-intervention, Mr. Kossuth rather exultingly asks, in answer to some objections, if France did not give us active and material aid in the days of the Revolution? Certainly; but that was her business, and not ours—that was her policy, and not ours. It is very simple in Mr. Kossuth to ask such a question. He should read history; the little tags he picks up from editors and reporters and conferring friends will not suffice. Do the advocates of this resolution—the advocates of the abandonment of our non-intervention—depend upon this question as an argument for them? Is it not known in history that France had possessions contiguous to the colonies, and that it was her business to protect them? It was her policy to come here and afford us aid against England, as well for her own sake as for ours. There is an answer to any little exaltation any man may have, in referring to the French question. I say it was her policy to desire to defeat England, as well as her inclination, to aid a suffering and oppressed people as we were at that time, which brought her to our shores.

And now, as I have a few moments left, I beg leave to call your attention to another fact. I have passed over many things which I should like to dwell upon, but I turn to consider another question, which is a part of his mission, and that is the question of religion. Religion! I have a book, written by his biographer, and, of course, his friend, in which he says that one of Kossuth's objects is "to beat down the Catholic religion!" "That in the struggle in the Hungarian controversy depended the prevalence of the Protestant religion!" That is, the Protestant religion would rise or fall with the Hungarian struggle. This man goes on to show that Kossuth's object is to destroy the Catholic religion. (Telf's Book.) I refer to this in order to ask, whether freedom in religious worship is not one of the corner-stones of our institutions. I ask if it is proper in the Congress of the United States, by its assembled wisdom, to say to this man, "Come here—sit us up, in order that we may superintend secret expeditions against Austria; come here to feast, drink, loaf, and lounge, teach us politics, and interfere with our religion, also?" Shall we say this? Sir, our notion of religious liberty is derived from the Pilgrim Fathers—was founded upon the Rock of Plymouth—and is diffused through all our institutions, so that the humblest log-cabin in the Far West, if dedicated to Christian worship, is as sacred in the eyes of the law as the lordliest cathedral in the Eastern world. And yet, you invite this man to come here to carry on his crusade upon religious subjects. Crusade! A word that reminds us of the days of chivalry; and if we would yield a moment to the false appearances of this day, we might say that Burke was wrong when he exclaimed "The days of chivalry were gone." The apostles of this man have already proclaimed him to this country as another Peter the Hermit. Ah! there is another exhibition of the religious part of his mission. I am willing to acknowledge, that Kossuth must be a man of consummate eloquence. I am perfectly satisfied of that fact. I have read his speeches with great admiration, mixed up with a little indignation, and that opinion I have expressed. I am not a man to turn my eyes from the face of genius. Wherever it exists, whatever may be its sentiments, I love to look upon it, because I know that in the face of genius there is the image of God. I am willing to say, that Kossuth possesses all the charms to make him a most accomplished man and a gentleman, and I should consider it my misfortune if he should pass through here without my seeing him, and, if I dared, I should venture to make his acquaintance. I do not think that the idea of a mission like that of Peter the Hermit will be tolerated in this country. What was the object of Peter's mission? It was to raise an innumerable army to fight in the cause of religion. He was said to be a man of great and exceeding eloquence, as no doubt he must have been, to have produced such a wonderful effect. I ask, you then, are we ready for another Peter the Hermit? Are we ready to be instructed by some Eastern monk? Why, sir, we have enough orators at home—men born in the West—cradled in the wilderness, where everything around them is grand; and if men grow where grandeur surrounds them, they cannot help being orators. If we want any Peter, we do not want him from the East. We want Peter the Hunter, from the West.

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

Let our instructions come from that source.

I will make another observation, and that is in reference to the idea of establishing republican governments in Europe. New governments there are continually rising and falling; and have they not been trying to establish republican governments there for the last thousand years? Have they ever succeeded? And why not? Because of their antiquities, and their monuments breathing, smacking, and smelling of nobility and royalty, and because half of the people are pretendants. Where that state of society exists, one man will always want to be superior to the others, and the idea of human agrarianism is a mere absurdity. Look at the present condition of France. What a mockery upon republican institutions. Having driven out her King—having achieved the first step—having done all that was necessary, she could not take a common name for her President. She had to take a princely name—a name connected with royal and princely blood. What a mockery! What chance would such a republican name as Jones, Davis, Johnson, Thompson, or Smith have [laughter] of being President of republican France? I tell you that Republics exist where God has so ordained, and nowhere else; and all your sympathy for eastern Republics is thrown upon the water, without the virtue of the bread. Republics exist where men are born free—where there are no monuments of royalty—where there are no antiquities, no heraldries to remind one of the superior origin of his blood. God has written it, and it is inevitable, that no Republics shall exist for a long period of time in their true character, where the monuments of the country are indelibly connected with nobility and royalty; but they shall exist in the Western hemisphere, where the anointed king has never placed his foot. There is no regal atmosphere here. There are no histories, no heraldries, no songs to inspire us with the idea that one man shall be superior to another, except in the love and affections of the people. As long as that state of things exist, we will be free. But in the course of time—I trust it will be thousands of years hence—by some accident of nature, we may be blotted out, and this which is now the Western abiding place of liberty, may be the Eastern home of kings, and the Eastern land, by some freak of nature, may be covered up, and these monuments of regality and nobility may be buried, and the places hallowed by the footsteps of kings may be thousands of feet under the earth. Then, and not till then, will there be a genuine republican government on the Eastern continent. Now, I say that all your sympathy is thrown away, and all your fighting for a man struggling to be a head of a republic in the East, is but to elevate a prince into places of power, in order that he may oppress his serfs. The present Republic of France is but the nursery of new Robespierres and Dantons, whose days of blood are not far off!!

When did Kossuth become a republican? Never until he reached England. What was he fighting for? Why, for the permanence of the Hungarian constitution. Here is the Hungarian constitution, as he says to us himself in his New York speech—here is the constitution he was trying to perpetuate. "Hungary is a free and independent Kingdom"—(Kingdom)—"having its own self-constituent existence and constitution, and not subject to any other nation and country in the world. The only tie between us and Austria, was that we were bound to elect to be our Kings the same dynasty, which were also the sovereigns of Austria." Here you see that this free constitution and this free country fought for by Kossuth in the Hungarian struggle, had a King! And all Kossuth wanted, was to establish their ancient constituencies. There is the republic for whose perpetuation he was striving and fighting.

He comes here now to this country almost a red republican—a much better republican than ourselves, who were born republicans. But I am proud of his conversion. I congratulate him and the cause of liberty throughout the world, that American atmosphere has had such a magical effect upon him.

I had some interesting authorities, which I would like to read if I had time, but I will close my remarks by thanking the House for their kind indulgence in hearing me.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote on the adoption of the title.

The question was then taken, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. FITCH asked the unanimous consent of the House for the purpose of introducing a preamble and resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Whereas on the 2d of January, 1848, the House of Representatives of the United States declared that the then existing war with Mexico was "unnecessarily and unjustly begun by the President of the United States," which declaration, if uncontradicted, may hereafter lead to erroneous opinions of the cause of that war, and the views and motives of those engaged in its active prosecution; therefore—

Resolved, That the said declaration was a libel upon our country's cause, a stigma upon the memory of the brave dead of that war, and a reproach upon the living who fought its battles; that it was unfounded in fact, and expressed not the opinion of the people of the United States, but that only of an accidental majority in Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to their introduction.

Mr. FITCH moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to introduce the resolution; upon which motion

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 102, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bocock, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Clark, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Dory, Dunham, Eastman, Edmundson, Edgerton, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gorman, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Isiah G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Milson, Molony, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Price, Richardson, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Savage, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard B. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Venable, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Wildrick—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, William Appleton, Bell, Bennett, Bowie, Bowden, Brooks, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Chingman, Conger, Cullom, George T. Davis, Evans, Ewing, Fowler, Gentry, Goodenow, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hillyer, Horstford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, George G. King, Kuhns, Landry, Mann, Martin, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Porter, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, and Williams—53.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, who was without the bar when his name was called, asked permission to record his vote.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected. He had been there, he said, for eight years, and never knew the privilege to be accorded to any one.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CLINGMAN, from the Committee on Territories, by general consent, reported the following resolution; which was read and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House all such information as may be in his possession, calculated to show the actual condition of things in the Territory of Utah; and especially to enable the House to ascertain whether the due execution of the laws of the United States has been resisted or obstructed; whether there has been any misappropriation of the public funds; and whether the personal rights of our citizens have been interfered with in any manner.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information he may have received respecting the seizure and confiscation of the barque "Georgiana," of Maine, and the brig "Susan Loud," of Massachusetts, by the Spanish and Cuban authorities; together with all applications and correspondence in reference thereto; and that he inform the House what measures (if any) have been taken for the indemnification, by the Spanish Government, of the captains, owners, and crews of said vessels.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MEADE asked the general consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, information, if any, in his power, first, as to the conclusion of the treaty between Spain, France, and Great Britain, in respect to the Island of Cuba, and the nature of that treaty; second, as to the relative strength of the British, French, and United States squadrons in the West India seas; and thirdly, whether additional appropriations are necessary to increase our force on that station.

Mr. CARTTER objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. MEADE moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce it; which question was put and agreed to.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, by general consent, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual rate of compensation.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, by the unanimous consent of the House, reported the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to cause such repairs to be made in their committee room as the majority of such committee may deem necessary, not to exceed in cost the sum of $20.

Mr. EVANS asked and obtained leave, and introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia," which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SIBLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House, 1st. What progress has been made, if any, in the construction of certain roads authorized by Congress in the Territory of Minnesota; 2d. What amounts of the sum appropriated by Congress for that object has been expended, and for what specific purpose; 3d. What additional sum, in his opinion, will be necessary for the completion of the roads so authorized.

LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the joint resolution of welcome to Louis Kossuth; which was presented to the Speaker, and received his signature.

REFUNDING OF MONEYS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California, on leave, introduced the following bill, of which previous notice had been given, to authorize and direct the payment of certain moneys into the treasury of the State of California, which was collected in the ports of said State as excise upon imports since the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, and previous to the admission of California into the Union.

The bill having been read a first and second time by its title,

Mr. MARSHALL moved its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs; and it was so referred.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the reference to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late.

Mr. JONES. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MARSHALL. The reference that I moved, of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, was a very appropriate one under all the circumstances. The moneys which that bill provides to be refunded to the State, or rather to the treasury of California, were collected under a military administration, and are now in some part of the military department in this city. The matter is one that comes properly under the cognizance of the committee to which I have moved its reference. There are other reasons, sir, which I had intended some time or other in the course of this session to state—but perhaps it would be as well to state them now—why I prefer the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee of Ways and Means. At the head, and the one next to the head of the latter committee, are gentlemen very distinguished for their economy—for an economy that induces them to negate everything which looks like an appropriation. I desire to refer my bill first to the Committee on Military Affairs—an appropriate and proper committee. I want it to escape, if possible, altogether the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means. These are the motives. Everybody understands them. If the bill ever falls into the hands of that committee, it is buried. I know that now. I therefore propose that the bill be referred as indicated and I rely upon the generosity of the House to sustain this reference, that it may, at least, have a fair chance—that at least it will not be prejudged before it is even presented.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman from California has certainly not made up his opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means from any knowledge that he has. I ask that gentleman if he ever heard of a bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, as now constituted, or as constituted at the last session of Congress, which was buried, or was permitted to sleep in that committee? I ask him, sir, if this is not a prejudgment and warning without knowledge upon his part? If the gentleman's bill is right, he has nothing to fear from me, or from the committee. If the gentleman will go back and look at the records of this House, and see when the Congress of the United States refused to give to his new State a territorial government after its organization in 1848—refused to give it the protection and benefit of our laws and government—and a proposition was brought here, sir, to send the tax-collector among that people, and levy taxes upon them, and make them pay tribute to a Government which denied them its protection and laws, he will find one individual—the one who now addresses you, sir, and who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means—who voted against sending the tax-collector to his people without first giving them the benefit of the laws and government under which we claim that that people belonged to. Now, sir, I say again, that if his bill is right, I do not prejudge it. If it is right—if this money was collected before they had the benefit of our laws—they should have the benefit of the money. The Committee of Ways and Means is the appropriate committee, in my opinion, for it, and not the Committee on Military Affairs. I hope, sir, that the House will do with it what they may think, in their judgment, is right. I would merely ask for the reading of the rule defining what sort of jurisdiction the Committee on Military Affairs shall have, and what the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. The very extraordinary course taken by the gentleman from California, and the unfounded and extraordinary remarks he has made with reference to myself, require that I should say a word upon the subject. I do not intend to give to it at present but a moment's consideration. The gentleman from California is, no doubt, well informed upon the matters coming before him, and under his peculiar management and jurisdiction. I do not pretend to deny to him transcendent abilities, peculiar knowledge, and a mind calculated to grapple with all subjects. And while he has, no doubt, his proper share of liberality, would it not have been well for him to have informed himself more correctly before he advanced any objection to the Committee of Ways and Means, or any of its members, and before he thus wantonly assailed, without, I apprehend, the least foundation in fact, the chairman and other members of that committee? I undertake to say that his declarations, as far as I am concerned, are gratuitous and unjust. From what, sir, does he judge of my course upon that subject? Does he know that I have prejudged his bill? And has he any reason for saying that I have such opinions of economy that I am unwilling to vote appropriations for anything, or give countenance to any proposition, that will draw money from the Treasury, however just the demand upon that Treasury? Sir, I was not in the last Congress. I presume the gentleman has not consulted my votes while I had the honor, formerly, of a seat here; and if he has, then he is more in fault, because my votes show, through the whole course of my legislative career here, that I voted for most of the propositions for appropriations that were deemed by the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means as necessary and right to the proper administration of the Government. Has he consulted the Journals thereof? I had the honor of being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means for several years, during the time I was a member of this House; and although I have been regarded as strict in my opinions of economy, I have never yet found any one who has been willing to hazard the expression, (for it is a hazard,) that I would prejudge a proposition of this character, or any other.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California probably did not weigh the import of the language he used. He ought to know, if he does not, that we are here acting under the same solemn injunctions that are resting upon him. We have our duties to discharge to the country, and it ought to be presumed, at least, that we are as willing to discharge these duties as the gentleman himself; and if he had exercised that charity which he would wish others to exercise towards him, he would never have committed the blunder of making the unfounded and gratuitous attack upon the Committee of Ways and Means that he has made. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the appropriate committee for the investigation of the bill presented by the gentleman from California, is the Committee of Ways and Means.

I have no desire, as one of the members of that committee, to have charge of the bill. If the bill should be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, so far as my action is concerned, as one of that committee, I will give it the same careful and candid investigation which I intend to give to all other propositions that may come before that committee. I would examine into its merits, and if I supposed it had merits sufficient to entitle it to the favorable consideration of the committee and the House, I would give it my sanction; otherwise, I would not. And upon the subject of appropriation, allow me to say here, for myself, as defining the position I occupy, and the course I mean to pursue upon that subject—that I intend, as far as my action goes as a member of that committee and this House, to give to the Administration in power fair and liberal appropriations to carry on this Government. Beyond that I do not intend to go.

I do not prejudge the estimates from the Departments. I do not pretend to say whether they are large, or whether they are small. When they come properly before me I will judge of them; but, as a general rule for my conduct as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and a member of this House, I intend, as I before said, to give the Administration in power fair and liberal appropriations to carry on the Government. I intend to pass, according to the best judgment I have, upon all bills that it may be the pleasure of the House to submit to that committee. It may, and I have no doubt will be the case, that I shall be found against some of the bills that will come before the committee. That is the case with members upon all committees. Every member must, at times, meet with disappointment in not getting his bills through the committees and the House. It is natural. We do not all view the merits of a bill alike. We differ in opinion upon the subjects involved, and it is natural that it should be so. While I have said thus much, and while I have declared here in my place that I will give my support to appropriations which I consider fair and liberal for the Government, I will not be found amongst those who are disposed—and I hope there may be none in this Congress—to waste and squander the public money. I regret exceedingly the remarks of the gentleman from California, [Mr. MARSHALL,] which made it necessary for me to say a word. They were so unjust, and so unfounded in fact, it was due to myself that I should say what I have said.

Mr. HIBBARD obtained the floor; but gave way to

Mr. MARSHALL, of California, who said: I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the storm that seems to be raised around me for a few suggestions I felt myself obliged to throw out. I conceived that the Committee of Ways and Means would have felt itself preeminently flattered at what I said. I found their character, for economy, prevailing so universally here, that I thought it was a thing at which they had aimed all their political life. I meant it as a compliment, though it did not suit me exactly; and I thought when the charge made by me against them found its way into the papers, and went to their constituents, that their political fortunes would be made forever. [Laughter.] Well, I did not mean to prefer against them any very grave charge. I did not mean anything that ought to occasion feelings of resentment, when I said that this bill, and all bills of this character, would be prejudged in that committee. I have no doubt these gentlemen will, in the spirit of a California committee, give this bill a fair hearing, as they say—just as our committees do give a fellow a fair trial, and then hang him. [Laughter.] He will have an admirably fair trial; but this is a bill in which I take an interest. It is a just and fair bill. It provides for the refunding of a sum of money to which California is entitled, if any country upon earth had a right to any money. Refunding is a proverbially difficult operation in the Congress of the United States. It is a matter of peculiar difficulty to get money paid back after it has once passed into the coffers of the United States, as this has done. I say, therefore, the bill labors under peculiar difficulties, and I have been obliged to say all this, and do all I have done. I felt I was obliged to do it in justice, to my constituents, because I knew, if in addition to the difficulties that beset it naturally and necessarily, it is referred to the aforesaid Committee of Ways and Means, that it was a gone bill. I know that; and I therefore do urge the reference of this bill to that committee which is equally as appropriate as the Committee of Ways and Means. Such reference is not without example—without precedents in the history of this very body. Mr. Clay made his celebrated report upon the public lands from the Committee on Manufactures, to which it was referred. Everybody recollects that. I say there is nothing inappropriate—no violation of rules in the reference which I wish to make to the Military Committee, as it is the only one which will have the collateral information necessary to a fair investigation, and a correct report. I do therefore urge its reference to the Military Committee, and not to the other. The object of the bill might have been gathered from its title. It is this: It is to repay to the State of California the money which was collected under the military occupation of that country, at a time when she had no benefit from the laws of the United States, and at a time when she had no representative in any legislative body, thus involving the very principle of the revolutionary war—taxation without representation. It is perfectly just that the refunding should be made, and it is money, moreover, our young State wants. I hope the House will consider the necessity of the Military Committee having this bill, because it was under military occupation that the funds were collected; that military officers were the agents by which it was collected; and that that committee will alone be in possession of the information that is necessary to the proper understanding of the bill.

I have not the time nor the disposition to hunt up the Journals of this House, though I have looked at them some time ago, to establish and to prove the reputation which I charged upon those gentlemen—whether it is a creditable one to them or not—but I do not believe that the Journals of this House will show any one single, solitary instance of an appropriation out of the ordinary appropriations necessary to sustain the Government, and perfectly in the routine of their duty, having been supported by either of those gentlemen. I think not. I may be mistaken; but I do not know of any. Their reputation is general, as I have stated it. It has come to me everywhere. Whisperings have been made by members from bench to bench all around the Hall, that Jones and Houston are celebrated for that quality.

Several MEMBERS. "Order!" "Order!"

Mr. MARSHALL. Now, I do not mean to charge it as a bad quality. Economy is admirable in its place. I do not state it as a crime. I do hope the bill will be referred to the other committee, and taken away from that. I have felt obliged to say this much thus early in the session. I may possibly have to suggest the same thing in other cases. I rely upon the generosity of the House to give the bill at least a chance.

Mr. HIBBARD. I have but a word to say, and it is not with a view to vindicate myself, or any other member of the Committee of Ways and Means, from the remarks made by the gentleman from California, [Mr. MARSHALL.] I took no offence at them; I take none; but perhaps they were superfluous. If I have any objection at all to what the gentleman has said, it is that he did not do me the high compliment of including me, though an humble member of that committee, in his remarks. The gentleman says he deems the bill is prejudged—that it is sure to be defeated if it goes before the Committee of Ways and Means. I have no such opinion to express; but his firm conviction of the future fate of this bill has seemed to me to indicate in his own opinion that there is or may be something "rotten in Denmark." My mind is not in this way made up. As a member of the committee, of course my mind is open, as I suppose is that of the other gentlemen, to a fair consideration of that bill upon its merits. Nor have we, so far as I know, any wish that the House would impose duties upon us that do not belong to us. Nor have I any objection, if this House choose, with a full and fair understanding of the matter, to take from them this duty, or any other of the onerous duties which devolve upon the Committee of Ways and Means; but I wish to object to this understanding, because a precedent may be set in this matter. I suppose this bill ought to, and I wish it to, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, because I think it is clear, beyond all doubt, that it belongs to that committee. What is it, sir? The gentleman states it to be a bill respecting a part of the revenue of the Government—a part of the money that is now the revenue of the Government. It proposes to take from the Treasury of the United States a certain sum—several hundred thousand dollars—and refund it to the State of California. It was money collected as revenue, if I understand the bill aright, in California before it was a State, organized in its present form. This is a bill touching the revenue—touching the means of the Government to that extent. It is a matter that clearly and plainly belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means, and to none other. The House have power to send it elsewhere. They can do it if they please; but if this precedent—this example—is to be set, let it be done with a fair understanding of the question.

I propose only to read the first clause of the 78th rule, defining the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the 91st rule, defining the duties of the Committee on Military Affairs. The first clause of the 78th rule provides, "that it shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue, and of the expenditure; and to report, from time to time, their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into the lawmaking appropriations of money, and to report whether the moneys have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the departments, and the accountability of their officers."

The 91st rule provides "that it shall be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to take into consideration all subjects relating to the military establishment and public defence which may be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. I call for the reading of the 133d rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"133.—All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House."

Mr. S. The question of order I raise is, that this debate is altogether out of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The question was upon the propriety of the reference of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. I raise the point that no debate is now in order.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move the previous question. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Briggs] moves the previous question. The previous question, if sustained, will bring the House to a vote first on the proposition to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and if that does not prevail, then upon its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HIBBARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON moved that the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to; and The House adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. FREEMAN: A bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama.

HOWE: The petition of Robert Allen and others, citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to establish a post road from the city of Pittsburgh, via Alleghany city, Ferysville, Wexford, Zelienople, Harmony, Whitestown, Prospect, Centerville, Harrisville, and Wesley, to Franklin, Venango county.

On motion by Mr. KING, of New York, the petition and papers of Sylvanus Burnham were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition and papers of Zacharia Barber were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Also, the petition of Samuel Drew, asking interest on pay due to him as a soldier in the war of 1812.

Mr. BRAGG withdrew from the files the petition of the heirs of Senioice, and referred the same to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1851.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, showing the amount expended from the appropriation for the expenses of the agent of the Sublime Porte, and the balance remaining in the Treasury; which was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed.

IOWA ON THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Mr. President, it is with feelings of gratification and pride that I present to the Senate certain resolutions, which were adopted by the Legislature of Iowa on the 25th of January last, but which did not reach me until after the adjournment of the last session of Congress. I regard these resolutions as speaking the true American sentiment upon the question of slavery, and the rights and duties of our people under the Constitution and laws of the land. But to me, Mr. President, they afford an additional gratification, which is, that they are in sentiment an approval of the course of my colleague and myself upon that series of measures known as the "Compromise." We were the only Senators from any of the free States who were not instructed to vote for the Wilmot proviso, and its kindred abolition doctrines. Left to our own judgment, we gave a cordial and unwavering support to each and every one of those measures, believing, as I then did and now do, that we voted on the side of our country, and for its future welfare and prosperity.

These resolutions, I am very certain, reflect the sentiments of the Democratic party of Iowa, and a small portion of the Whigs of that State. The democracy of Iowa never adopted the Wilmot proviso in any State or even county convention, and their whole course through that period of fanatical excitement was such as, in my humble judgment, to commend itself to every lover of the Union. I wish I could say as much for my political opponents in that State, who, through their county and State conventions, and presidential electors, all declared for that proviso, and strove for its adoption, notwithstanding the attitude assumed by every Southern State upon that question. And it is due to truth further to say, that some of these designing and fanatical Whig politicians, who strove to introduce the poisonous ingredients of Abolitionism and Free-Soilism into the Legislature of our State, and voted in that body to instruct their Senators here to go for the Wilmot proviso, have been rewarded by this Administration by appointment to some of the most responsible and lucrative offices in that State, and that, too, after the President and the department (Interior) had been notified, verbally and in writing, as well as by reference to the journals of the Legislature, (to which they had access,) of the obnoxious proceedings of those to whom they deemed it proper to extend their favor and patronage. These attempts of the Administration to keep in favor with that class of politicians in Iowa and in other Northern States, are, doubtless, unknown to my distinguished friend, [Mr. Foote,] who has, within the past week, been so complimentary to those who now administer the General Government.

Mr. President, there are, in my opinion, other acts of gross violation of public duty upon the part of this Administration. I allude, sir, to their course towards the people of our country in not seeing that their rights were protected, and the laws and treaty stipulations for their benefit fully enforced. Their management of our foreign relations calls condemnation at the hands of other members of this body, who are more competent to the task, and who, I hope, will, at the proper time, do so. I am sure our honorable friend from Mississippi [Mr. Foote] would, were he permitted to remain with us during the residue of this session. The public press—Democratic I mean, not Whig—as well as the people everywhere, North and South, in public meetings and otherwise, have spoken in terms of rebuke not to be misunderstood, and it appears to me to be the duty of this body, particularly, to hold up such acts of gross dereliction of duty to the scorn of the world. Among these are to be enumerated the insults offered to our flag, in the firing into the Falcon; the arrest of the Prometheus; the merciless and inhuman butchery of fifty untried, unarmed, American youths; "the Anglo-Franco guard-a-costa of Cuba;" and the vindictive cruelty to Thrasher,—not to speak of the transportation, to the dungeons of Spain, of the one hundred and fifty American citizens who, like Thrasher, were condemned upon a mock trial, thereby adding insult to injury.

I move that the resolution be printed, and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of Eliza C. Bache, widow of George M. Bache, a lieutenant in the Navy, praying that she may receive the same amount that was paid to the widows of those officers who were lost in the brig Somers; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of San Diego, California, protesting against the change proposed to be made in the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, by the substitution of a coasting steamer; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of officers of the revenue service stationed in California, praying an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, the petition of Joseph Hill and sons, praying compensation for horses and mules stolen by the Indians in California; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of James R. Browning, praying indemnity for property stolen and destroyed in California during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the memorial of James C. Cushing and others, representing that they have discovered a pass through the greater range of the Sierra Nevada, and proposing to open a wagon-road upon certain conditions; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOUSTON presented the memorial of S. H. Duff, praying compensation for services in seizing spirituous liquors under an order of General Taylor, during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a memorial of officers of the Army serving in New Mexico, praying that they may be placed on the same footing in regard to pay as the troops serving in California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present the memorial of José Maria Jarero, a citizen of Mexico, praying the payment of a claim of an American citizen against the Government of Mexico, which was received by said Jarero in payment of a debt. He represents himself to be a citizen of Mexico, and a General in the Mexican service.

Mr. S. As I desire to have this memorial referred to the Committee of Claims, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of that committee for a moment. The memorialist states, that previous to the war he procured, in payment of a debt, a claim against the Mexican Republic; that this claim was for arms and munitions of war purchased by the Mexican Minister for his Government. He further states that the claim was established in the courts of Mexico, and admitted by the Mexican Government; that after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo the Mexican Congress decreed that it was one of the claims to be paid out of the three millions and a quarter which was set apart by the treaty for that purpose; that upon the application of the Mexican Minister, the claim was submitted to the Board of Commissioners for their decision; that the decision of the Board was adverse, on the ground that it was not an American claim at the date of the treaty, being held by a Mexican. Now this is the point to which I particularly request the attention of the chairman of that committee, as well as of such of the members as may be present in the Senate. It was considered a valid American claim in its origin and character; but having passed into the hands of a Mexican previous to the date of the treaty, and being in his hands at the date of that instrument, it ceased to be an American claim, and consequently became a Mexican claim, and was, therefore, not provided for by the treaty. It should also be observed that the treaty makes the decision of the Board of Commissioners final; and that, consequently, this memorialist has no redress except by application to Congress.

He states, still further, that there are $45,000 of the residue of the three millions and a quarter still unexpended, and that the Government of his country have requested that this amount should be applied to the payment of this debt. I again beg to state that the commissioners decided that this claim was a just one, and that it was American in its origin, American in its character; but that having been assigned to a Mexican at the date of the treaty, it ceased to be American and became Mexican; whereas, the petitioner shows most conclusively that this decision is not within the spirit and meaning and equity of the treaty.

I move that this memorial, together with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Priscilla C. Simonds, praying compensation for the effects of her son, Moses H. Simonds, who died in service, which were taken possession of by his superior officer and lost; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Gridley Bryant, proposing to enter into a contract with the Government for the erection of a permanent lighthouse on Minot's Ledge, in Massachusetts bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Isaac Lilly, praying compensation for a vessel and cargo seized and sold by an agent of the Government, under the erroneous pretext of her having on board timber cut from the live-oak land of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of E. Pavestadt and F. A. Schumacher, praying the return of duties paid on goods which were lost at sea; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BRADBURY. I present a memorial of William T. Johnson and others, publishers of newspapers in Maine, praying an alteration in the rates of newspaper postage.

I am requested to call the particular attention of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to a defect in the present postage law. The petitioners do not, by any means, ask to do away with the system established by law during the last session of Congress, but desire that a defect in that law may be remedied. They set forth that they are the publishers of newspapers which are devoted to the publication, in an extended form, of the details of legislative proceedings and debates; that their circulation is largely dependent upon members of the Legislature, who purchase their papers in quantities from time to time for distribution among their constituents; that the present postage law, establishing a high rate upon transient newspapers and requiring their prepayment, operates very injuriously against that part of their circulation which is thus derived from members of the Legislature; and that their paper is thus prevented from having as full a distribution as it would have were this part of the law somewhat modified. Undoubtedly, members of the Legislatures of other States were similarly situated, as well as the publishers of other papers.

The memorialists believe that the existing rates of postage established in regard to papers sent from their office are adequately sufficient, and they therefore ask that, in this respect, the law may be modified.

I move to refer the memorial to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The memorial was so referred.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a petition of the late and present land officers at Batesville, Arkansas, praying compensation for services in entering lands under bounty land warrants. A bill having been reported, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Samuel Spalding, praying arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Jacob Young, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Washington, praying an appropriation for the erection of an equestrian statue of Washington under the resolution of Congress of 1783; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITCOMB presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Westfield, Indiana, recommending that the sale of the public lands be discontinued, and that they be granted in limited quantities to the citizens of the United States with families; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of Isaac Bush, John Price, and Thomas Suarez, praying compensation for themselves and the officers and men under their command during the Seminole war in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate relating to the claim of B. Juan Domercq, a Spanish subject, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the petition of G. Thomas Howard, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Samuel Crapin, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of L. E. L. A. Lawson, heir of General Eleazer W. Ripley, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Phebe Glover, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Charles A. Kellet.

Also, a bill for the relief of Enoch Baldwin.

Mr. FELCH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to revise and continue in force for a limited time the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of public land.

Also, a bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the balance of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d March, 1827, granting lands to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to extinguish the individual stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal, in order to make the navigation free and to enlarge it.

Mr. JAMES gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a committee of practical scientific men, to make a series of practical experiments for the purpose of ascertaining if possible the cause or causes of the explosion of steam boilers.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That after the first day of January next, Fridays of each week shall be set aside for the consideration of private claims, and that on those days private bills have priority over all other business.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the petition, reported a bill authorizing Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Charles Melrose, reported it without amendment.

He also submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Michigan for saline purposes, reported it without amendment.

SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution in relation to printing the Seventh Census, reported it without amendment, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Joint Committee on Printing be directed to contract with Donaldson & Armstrong for printing the census returns, upon such terms as they may deem reasonable.

Mr. BRIGHT asked that the resolution might be considered at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let it lie over.

The resolution was passed over accordingly.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the compensation of such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the 15th section of the act of August 6, 1846, for the additional services required under that act; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOWNS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of William Darley; which was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to Monday next, and be the special order of that day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the repair and improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. BRIGHT, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide more effectually for overcoming the obstructions to the navigation of the Ohio river at the falls thereof; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to grant to the city of Burlington, in Iowa, the land heretofore reserved between that city and the Mississippi river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to 31st July, 1851; which was read a first and second time by its title.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That it be referred to a select committee consisting of five members, to be appointed by the President.

Mr. BRADBURY, Mr. SMITH, Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. DOWNS, and Mr. FELCH were appointed the committee.

TONNAGE DUTIES.

Mr. MALLORY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act entitled "An act concerning tonnage duty on Spanish vessels;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CALIFORNIA BRANCH MINT.

The engrossed bill to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States in California, was read the third time and passed.

WELCOME TO KOSSUTH.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move to take up a resolution which I moved to lay on the table the other day. The resolution proposes the appointment of a committee of three to introduce Louis Kossuth to the Senate. I presume that, after what has taken place, both here and in the other House, there will now be no opposition to the resolution.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to have the resolution read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, and introduce him to the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I would be much gratified if the Senator from Illinois would withdraw his motion for a few moments, so as to permit a bill to be read a third time. I feel pretty well assured that there will be debate on the resolution of the Senator from Illinois—the Senator from Wisconsin amongst others will debate it—and it will not take one minute to have the bill I have mentioned read a third time. If there were not likely to be debate on this resolution I would not ask the Senator to give way.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to call up this resolution because I think that under existing circumstances it should now be acted upon. If it is likely to create any debate it can be laid over. But after the action that has already been had upon the subject I cannot imagine that it will generate debate. I think the question has been as much debated already as is desirable, and I am also inclined to believe that the Senate generally concur in that opinion.

Mr. BADGER. It seems to me that the question with regard to this resolution occupies a different position from that which it occupied on the joint resolution. I entertain now precisely the same opinions which I entertained prior to the passage of that resolution—opinions which I have already expressed to the Senate. But, by an uncommon unanimity in both branches of Congress, Kossuth has been recognized as the guest of the nation. This has been done no doubt upon the supposition that the joint resolution would be approved by the President of the United States, of which there can be no doubt; and the question now is, Being, by the action of the constituted authorities, such guest of the nation, is it proper that this resolution should be taken up and passed? That point being settled I shall make no vexatious opposition to the proceeding.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that the action of the Senate, so far as this resolution is concerned, has settled the question, unless a change takes place in the minds of the Senators. This resolution was a material part of the resolution which was rejected the other day, and which was offered as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to discuss the resolution until it is taken up.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the reason why I think it cannot be taken up, being part of the resolution of the Senator from New York; and that resolution was the same in substance as the resolution of the Senator from Illinois, with the exception of this portion which it is now proposed to revive.

The question was then taken on the motion to take up the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. ATCHISON. I would like to know the effect of that resolution before I vote. If this committee shall be appointed, I suppose they will proceed to New York, or wheresoever Kossuth may be, for the purpose of bringing him to Washington and introducing him to the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will amend it by saying "on his arrival in the capital."

No objection being made, the resolution was so amended.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President: Notwithstanding it has been announced by the mover of this resolution that it has been discussed sufficiently, I ask the attention of the Senate for some ten or fifteen minutes, that I may express my views upon the subject. It is true that the resolution has been discussed, but my views have not been expressed. Differing so widely in some respects from some who have spoken, I have been particular in maturing my own views, and I shall be particular in expressing them to the Senate.

The present occasion and the subject of present discussion, are more momentous and of deeper import than the eye or the mind will readily discover without careful examination and deep reflection. They merit this examination and reflection; and from me they have and shall receive them—not, however, from considerations of mere etiquette—of what is due to Governor Kossuth as a man or a patriot, or to the Senate, as regards its dignity; but from considerations of a far deeper, broader, and more sacred character—such as concern the happiness, security, and duty of our Republic.

When the question was taken upon the resolution to welcome Governor Kossuth to the capital and country, I voted for it, as I shall for that now under consideration; but for very different reasons, and from very different motives from any that I have heard expressed in the Senate. I did and shall do so, not as a mere personal compliment to Governor Kossuth, (great and preëminent as I concede and claim his merits to be;) for this, I infer, he did not and does not desire. The purpose of his mission and his life has a far higher and more noble end and aim. Nor did I, nor shall I vote on this subject for the purpose of rendering mere vocal tribute to his political creed, principles, or character. This can be better done by the people in their spontaneous plaudits, responsive to his sentiments. Indeed, sir, if these had been and were the only reasons which my mind could urge upon the subject, I should have voted against the former, and would vote against the present resolution. I am averse to all personal adulation, intended merely as such, and where no practical good is intended or can result. I mistake Governor Kossuth's republican principles if he do not entertain similar sentiments. Nor yet, sir, have I voted, nor shall I vote for these resolutions because I can see in their consequences no change in our neutral policy, but for the very reverse. I advocate them because I think I discover in them the initiatory step toward the abandonment of our now impolitic, unwise, and unjust system of neutrality.

Let no one do himself the injustice, or me the false charity, to suppose that this is a conclusion or determination to which I have hastily sprung. Far from it, sir. I have long desired to see our neutral policy abandoned or overthrown; and I hail the events of the present hour, as happy omens of a speedy consummation of my wishes.

I contend, Mr. President, that what was our policy in our infancy and weakness, has ceased to be our true policy now that we have reached to manhood and strength. And I deny, what is so often asserted, that either Washington or any of the founders of the Republic, ever recommended that the neutral policy of our early days should become an established principle, to govern the conduct of the country in the days of its maturity and power.

As a period and condition of human existence, infant weakness is naturally timid, and instinctively cautious. It ranges only within the walks of security and home; is governed by its wants or necessities—without the power of adventure to supply or gratify even these. It may look on with tears, commiseration, and pity, at a cruel imposition or infliction upon its fellow and infant associate; but it can neither resent the wrong nor defend against it—it can only stand careful and trembling for its own security. Strike it cannot—to interpose would be futile and dangerous. But when arrived at manhood, the same course of conduct would merit and receive the hiss of scorn, and stamp the wretch a coward and poltroon. It would also render his position insecure, by inviting insult and aggression.

So it was, so it is, and so it will be, with our Government and country. When we had but just struggled into infant existence, we could manifest commiseration and pity only, when we saw the feeble breast of our sister, Poland, mangled by the iron heel of despotism, and her substance divided, and her name blotted out by tyrants. But now, when matured and strong, shall we supinely and timidly look on, and see all the morals, justice, and principles of international law violated, without interposing? The law of nations, under that of the Creator, is the law of the civilized world—is as binding upon despots as upon republicans, and republics are as much interested in its maintenance as monarchies, or despotisms, and have more right to interpose to defend and maintain it, than they to violate and destroy it. And what principle or rule of that law should be more dear to America, than that which secures the right of the masses to rise and throw off the yoke of oppression through the medium of revolution, and this, too, in a fair and single-handed contest with the oppressor? But, while this principle is thus dear and important to our country and the cause of liberty, shall we never raise our voice or hand to defend or sustain it, but erase and expunge it, by conceding the right of despots to perpetually violate it? Shall another Poland be stricken from nationality and independence, to non-entity and oblivion, by a triple European despotism? Shall Italy again, while able, willing, and striving to stand erect and free against her native oppressor, be stricken down, bleeding, and more enslaved, at the feet of tyrannic France and Austria? Or shall Hungary, struggling alone and friendless against the tyranny of Austria, with victory and triumph already perching upon her republican standard, be again trampled to the dust—enslaved and chained by intermeddling Russia? and all this without a murmur or a blow from the land of Washington and Franklin? God forbid! Yet, address these questions to some Senators, whose heads have whitened in the service and battle of conservatism, and they will answer, Yes; but I address them to the manly hearts of the American people, and the answer will be one universal and indignant, No! NEVER!

Sir, our strength no longer consists in a policy so criminally neutral. It did so in the beginning, only because the success of our experiment was distrusted by the people of all countries; and we could gain no sympathy by showing sympathy with others. But our success is no longer problematic; nor the permanency of our Government and institutions doubted by any. Republican spirits, in every clime, feel joy in our triumph, and are enlisted for our defence and protection. Their hopes run high to imitate our example; and they feel those hopes would be forever blasted by our downfall. If we now discharge aright our high mission, by sympathizing with them in their struggle, and danger should assail us, they will feel our cause to be their own; and whatever soil they may tread, will be made a recruiting station in our defence. The next army that invades our country will come to fight our battles, and not to crush our liberties. With us, the day of conflict with mercenaries will have passed; and armies of invasion will have become but organized armies of immigration, seeking a hearthstone and a home among us, to be enjoyed and defended in common with our own. Sir, if you deem me visionary, or over-sanguine in these opinions and hopes, pray tell me where you would find the Hungarian, the German, the Irishman, the Briton, Frank, or Swede, who would wield the sword or bear the standard of a despot upon our shores, and against our country and republic? You could not more gravely insult the millions of these braves amongst us, than by asking them if they would do so. Yet, sir, they are but the representative few of countless hosts left behind, actuated by a similar spirit. The situation of a Haynau, commanding an army of these in America, would soon be forlorn and pitiable indeed. The treatment of the English brewers would be mercy and hospitality itself, compared to that he would receive here, at the hands of his own troops.

But, sir, seal or lock up the stores of your sympathy—suffer the spirit of liberty to struggle, bleed, and expire alone in its unequal conflict with intruding despots, and you cut the sympathetic chord that binds the freedom-loving world to your cause; you consolidate despotism, and at length, when it shall turn upon you, as the last survivor of republicanism, you, too, must struggle, bleed, and fall alone. No friendly heart or hand will be left to sympathize or strike in your cause or your defence.

This, sir, must be the result at last, if we continue our present policy. No one can believe, that, with the present and growing intelligence of the world, despotisms and republics can much longer occupy the earth together. The flame of conflict is already kindled; the blood of one or the other must quench it. Between the spirits of the two political existences, there can be no compromise; one or the other must quit the world. In the struggle we cannot remain neutral if we would—and it is useless longer to disguise the fact. For one, I throw off all disguise. I am for the cause of liberty and free Government, against slavery and despotism, throughout the globe—and this without disguise.

Far be it from me, however, to recommend or advocate the policy of predatory or aggressive warfare, or warfare for conquest. I will go as far as the most pacific against all interference in the internal polity or concerns of other nations. But I take and maintain a wide distinction between the internal concerns of nations, and international concerns. While Russia or Austria is content under a monarchy or despotism, or so long as the monarch or despot can, within himself, or with his own resources, maintain his authority and power, be it so—let him alone. This is a matter of internal concern to the nation, and she has the right to be let alone. I would protest against the interference of our own or any other country as a Government. But when the people of either rise up and seek to throw off the yoke, or break the chain that galls them, and the other would interfere to prevent them, this becomes an international concern—an affair between nations; and involves a breach of the law and morals of nations, in which we become an interested party with all other nations. Against such interference I would not only have our country protest, but I would have her interpose both her moral and physical power, whether in conjunction with England or alone. In this case we have the right to interpose, and I contend that justice, as well as our interest and security, makes it our duty to interpose.

Sir, peace is beautiful and holy when it can be justly and honorably maintained; but war, with all its tragedy and blood, is less to be dreaded than dishonorable or "ignoble peace;"—peace at the expense of peace, justice, liberty, and the rights of man. In the case supposed, even war on our part, against intervention, would be sacred to the cause of peace. It would be necessary in order to conquer conflict, establish peace, and defend the right. Without our interposition, there would not be peace, but wrongful war; and we, too, a party to the wrong by acquiescence. As a friend and advocate of peace, as well as of national morality and national law, I would recommend war in such an extremity, when merely moral means had proved unavailing. Nor would I delay or wait for the cooperation of England—though I am not one of those who would decline it. An alliance for such an occasion would not conflict with the policy or advice of Washington. He never condemned alliances temporary and for the occasion. He only declared that "it is your policy to steer clear of permanent alliances." He did not even recommend that this "policy" should be permanent and perpetual; but for such time only as would enable you "to gain time to your country to settle and mature its institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it the command of its own fortunes."

I believe that such time has been gained, and that our country has reached the required condition; and so far from condemning and declining the occasional cooperation of other countries in such a cause, I would approve and accept it, as I would, indeed, invite it.

Mr. President, of two things I feel certain: first, that the spirit of Russian absolutism, unless prevented by the interposition of constitutional governments, will triumph and prevail in Europe, and ultimately turn upon liberty here and elsewhere; and, second, that the only Powers on the broad face of God's earth which can interpose and prevent it, are the United States and England. Separately or in concert, then, we must act or fall; or, if not fall, must ultimately suffer and bleed to a degree of depletion tenfold that which our timely interposition would cause.

Sir, the portents of the hour are momentous indeed; and I fear are too dimly seen, or not at all, by the Senate and the country. With no enemy afield, despotic Europe is trembling under the sullen tread of a conscript soldiery; while gloomy Apprehension sits a joint occupant of the throne of monarchy. Why is this so? It is that a murmur of discontent—suppressed and low indeed, yet determined and universal—is heard to rise from the oppressed and down-trodden millions; and because monarchs see and know that occasion only is awaited by these millions, to rise and strike a more universal, terrible, and determined blow than ever yet was struck, for self-emancipation, self-government, and freedom. They see, also, that such an occasion will offer in the approaching struggle for the French Presidency. Princes, on the one hand, are looking to the Czar of Russia to bear them safely through; while the republican masses, on the other, are looking with beseeching eyes to America and England. Shall we turn coldly away, and leave tyranny to riot in its crimson orgies, and to raise its shout of triumph over the rights of nations and mankind? or shall we interpose, AND INTERPOSE NOW, to prevent it, and to staunch the flow of human blood? For one, by all the sacred promptings of the human heart, I am for the latter! I would now, or before another moon had waned, throw patent to the world a declaration that hereafter the practice, if not the policy of nations, must be "hands off," or non-intervention in the internal concerns or revolutions of other nations; and this declaration I would make good, too, when occasion should demand, by the blood and treasure of the land. But with such a declaration, the occasion would never arise: we would have no occasion to shed the one or to expend the other. These, sir, are the views which I entertain. I speak for no one but myself; but I should speak as I have thought I knew I stood alone. I neither ask nor expect commendation from this Senate—it is not for its commendation that I speak or think in matters of political import, but for the approval of my own heart, and for the promotion of right and justice, with the best interests of the Republic.

These being my views, I have all along regretted to hear Senators, while advocating these resolutions, so careful to disavow any meaning in them, or, in other words, to hear them declare, in effect, that they designed nothing tangible or practical; and yet, at the same time, profess the highest devotion to the cause of liberty, and the deepest sympathy for struggling and oppressed humanity. If our devotion and sympathy lie no deeper than the lip, they will be but little consolatory to Kossuth or to Hungary. To prove that they lie no deeper, I would advise that, when we meet the country's guest, and extend to him the right hand in fellowship, we offer him with the left our act of neutrality; and declare to him that it is a fixed, unalterable law of the land. From that he may read:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That if any citizen of the United States shall, within the territory and jurisdiction thereof, accept and exercise a commission to serve a foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people, in war, by land or by sea, against any prince, state, colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are at peace, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than $2,000, and shall be imprisoned not exceeding three years.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people, with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than $10,000, and imprisoned not more than three years, &c.

From this, Kossuth will learn that lip-devotees to liberty in the United States, punish practical devotees as malefactors and criminals.

Sir, I repeat that if I had nothing but words to render in the service of Hungarian freedom, I would be silent. But I have more: I will not only speak for it, but I will vote for it—write for it; and when occasion shall demand, under the smile of Heaven, I will fight for it. So would others who have spoken with so much seeming caution—and they might as well avow the fact. They do no good by their mental reservations—let them speak out, and act. Then Kossuth will have received a compliment, sublime indeed—a compliment of the means to triumph in the cause of liberty, and Hungary will be free.

Mr. BADGER. There is one thing in that resolution to which I wish to call the attention of my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] The resolution styles Louis Kossuth, "Governor of Hungary." That, I suppose, must be intended to assert the fact that he is Governor in reality or Governor in right. I suggest to my friend that he does not mean to make any such assertion. And surely it cannot be necessary to make known who Louis Kossuth is, to add as a description beyond his name the words, "Governor of Hungary." I would suggest, also, to the Senator, that the phraseology of the joint resolution which has passed both the Senate and the House differ from this. He is there designated as Louis Kossuth. If he was sufficiently known and described by that name there, is it necessary or proper to assert a different description here?

Mr. SHIELDS. I had no object in view, except to make it conform to the language of the President's message. I do not want to tavail about it. I think he is called Governor in the message. We are accustomed in this country, when a man has held an office, to continue calling him by the title which he had while in that office. I do not think it amounts to much. Some honor me, by calling me "General," though I am no General now. And we have Governors and Generals all over the country. However, I am willing to make it conform to the exact language of the President's message, whatever that may be, because I regard that as a kind of committal by the Executive, the representative of the nation, and I wish to go on as he commenced.

Mr. BADGER. I shall not move any amendment to the resolution. The Senator can shape it as he pleases. But I would submit to my friend, that when, in the joint resolution, which is the act of both Houses and is of the nature of a law, this gentleman is named by his Christian and surname only, and as this proceeding of the Senate is intended to follow out what has been done by that joint resolution, that it is the resolution which we are to follow, and not the incidental expression in the President's message. This resolution styles him "Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary." I admit that in common conversation, in addressing the honorable Senator from Illinois, we call him "General Shields;" but I submit that no formal paper in the world would now describe him as "James Shields, Brigadier General."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will read the language of the President's message. I hope my honorable friend from North Carolina will not regard it as a mere incidental expression, or as a trivial document. "The instruction above referred to was complied with, and the Turkish Government having released Governor Kossuth," &c. "Governor Kossuth." I am willing to make the resolution conform to that.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois proposes to strike out "Governor of Hungary," and insert previous to the name "Louis Kossuth," the word "Governor," so that it will read "Governor Louis Kossuth."

Mr. HALE. The President, when he first mentioned this matter, simply calls the gentleman "Louis Kossuth," and I think that is a better title than any we can put on him. Governors are very cheap. There are a good many of them. There is but one Louis Kossuth, and I think "Louis Kossuth" sounds better than "Governor Kossuth," or "Squire Kossuth," or any other title.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It would not add any importance to it, unless an objection were taken to it. Then, if we should strike it out, it might be significant. If it be necessary to express the proper idea, I presume the addition of one word will accomplish it—we might say "Louis Kossuth, the rightful Governor." If he be not the Governor de facto, if he is not in the exercise of the power belonging to that station, I apprehend there can be no question that he is the rightful Governor of Hungary, although ejected from Hungary for the time being. I would suggest the insertion of the word "rightful."

Mr. HALE. Before the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] I desire to read a single extract from the President's message, in which he refers to the resolution passed last session. He says: "On the third of March last, both Houses of Congress passed a resolution requesting the President to authorize the employment of a public vessel to convey to this country Louis Kossuth and his associates in captivity." That is the President's message. Reference is there had to what Congress had formerly done, and I suppose that the same words are used. If the Senator would make the resolution read literally correct, I suppose it would be "Louis Kossuth aforesaid;" but I presume he will not do that. It will be better to let it stand as it stood originally. It is a better title than any we can give him.

The question being taken on the part of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] to strike out "Governor of Hungary," it was agreed to.

The latter part of the amendment to insert the word "Governor" before "Louis Kossuth," was not agreed to.

The question was then on the resolution as amended.

Mr. MASON. I do not doubt that the very distinguished gentleman for whom this honor is intended, is the patriot whom he has been described to be by Senators on this floor; and that he is worthy of the honors which have been heaped upon him by the people of America. When the vote was taken upon the resolution of welcome to him, I was not here, or I should have voted for it cheerfully. But I am not prepared to extend the distinguished honor of a reception by the Senate, to that gentleman—an honor which has never been, I believe, conferred upon a citizen of America. It has been conferred only upon General Lafayette, who had been identified with the most trying scenes of our revolutionary struggles.

It is not, therefore, for any purpose of detracting from the merits of the gentleman to whom this honor is proposed to be extended, that I have desired thus to place myself right in the vote I shall give. I have another reason, sir. So far as I understand it, his avowed mission to the United States of America is to endeavor to induce this Government to depart from our long-established policy in relation to foreign nations. It may be that if this peculiar reception be given him by the Senate, it may be construed into some disposition on the part of the Senate to accredit him on his mission.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I have interfered with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] believing that this would occasion no debate.

Mr. MASON. I have finished what I had to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh! no. It will be a much higher compliment to pass it without the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Foote of Mississippi, Foot of Vermont, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, Miller, Norris, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Borland, Butler, Clemens, Dawson, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mason, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—15.

The resolution was adopted as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth, on his arrival at the capital, and introduce him to the Senate.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolution declaring the measures of adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Mr. RRETT resumed and finished the speech which he commenced yesterday, a report of which will be found in the Appendix.

After a few words from Mr. Foote, and a brief conversation, in which Mr. Borland, Mr. Foote, Mr. Mason, and others took part, (for which see Appendix,) Mr. Mason obtained the floor, and on motion,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON THE RULES.

The SPEAKER announced that the following gentlemen had been appointed the Committee on the Rules, by a resolution of the House: GEORGE W. JONES, of Tennessee; ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia; JOSEPH R. CHANDLER, of Pennsylvania; JOHN L. ROBINSON, of Indiana; EDWARD STANLY, of North Carolina; DAVID L. SEYMOUR, of New York; GEORGE G. KING, of Rhode Island; EDSON B. OLDS, of Ohio; and DANIEL WALLACE, of South Carolina.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER then announced that the first business in order would be the unfinished business of yesterday—the motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs the bill to refund to the State of California certain moneys collected in her ports.

COMMITTEE ON REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of privilege. I perceive that I have been appointed on three of the standing committees of the House. The rules allow me to decline serving on one of these committees, and therefore I avail myself of the right to decline serving on the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. In doing this, I intend no disrespect to the Speaker, nor to any of the members of that committee, but simply because I cannot perform the duties of so many committees.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman has a right to decline serving; and if there be no objection, he will be accordingly excused. So it was Ordered, That Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, be excused from further service on the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and that the Speaker be authorized to fill the vacancy created thereby.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Henry Johnson be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

THE WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution. It is known probably to the House, that a number of persons have been recently discharged from employment on the works at the Capitol now in progress of construction. I have been called upon by a number of these persons, and they desire me to present a resolution.

The following is the resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings, or whichever committee may have charge of the subject, be requested to report forthwith a bill making further appropriations for the continuance of the work recently in progress for the extension of the Capitol buildings, in order that a large number of mechanics and workmen, who have been deprived of work, and thereby their present means of subsistence, having been discharged a few days ago from that employment, may be again employed, it being exceedingly difficult at this inclement season of the year to obtain employment elsewhere in the city.

Mr. CLINGMAN inquired of the Chair the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that the unfinished business of yesterday is now in order. Any other business cannot intervene except by the unanimous consent of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks the unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I understand the Chair to state that the unfinished business of yesterday is in order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to the introduction of any business out of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the Chair to state that the business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact, that upon yesterday a motion to suspend the rules was in order. I understand the rule to be, that when the day arrives upon which it will be in order to move a suspension of the rules, business undisposed of on the previous suspension day would come up as the regular business in order. Hence it is not now in order—this not being suspension day—to recur to the bill introduced yesterday under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman that the question of order is, in his opinion, not admissible.

Mr. EVANS. I do not wish to debate this matter, but make a suggestion, if the Chair will have patience with me for a single moment. The 23d rule declares:

"That as soon as the Journal is read, the Speaker shall call for petitions from the members of each State and delegates from each Territory, beginning with Maine."

The 27th rule says that—

"After an hour shall be devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day."

Then by the 58th rule:

"The unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment shall have the preference in the orders of the day, and no motion on any other business shall be received without special leave of the House until the former is disposed of."

Mr. HALL. I rise to a question of order. I understand that no debate is in order upon the question of priority of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that the question of order is not debatable.

Mr. EVANS. I was reading the rules.

Mr. HALL. I understand you are making a speech.

Mr. EVANS. Not in the least. I suggest that the first business in order is the call of States for petitions, next for reports of committees; and then resolutions are in order. And when the orders of the day come up, the unfinished business of yesterday will have the preference. I call for the reading of the 23d, 27th, and 58th rules.

The rules were then read as inserted above.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to state the ground of his decision, which is this: But for the fact that the previous question had been seconded and the main question ordered to be put, the rules referred to would have required this bill to go over and take its place upon the calendar of the House. But the House ordered the main question to be put, and thus gives this bill or the unfinished business preference over all others. The main question must therefore be now put. By reference to the Journal of the Twenty-eighth Congress, the gentleman will find a decision directly in point. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Chair?

No appeal being taken, the Speaker stated the question as follows: The gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] moved a reference of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moved its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means. Upon this question the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and the yeas and nays were also ordered upon said question. The first question will be upon the proposition to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. I would ask permission of the House to make a few remarks in explanation of a personal matter.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. MARSHALL. I hope the objection may be withdrawn, as I shall consume but a very little time.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the Chair is bound to enforce the rule.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to inform the House, in the course of this explanation, in regard to the nature of the bill and the propriety of the reference.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to order.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to exculpate myself from the charge of making an attack upon the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it in order to make a motion to suspend the rules to allow the gentleman to proceed?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

The question was then taken upon referring the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and decided in the negative—yeas 75 nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, Bell, Bibbians, John H. Boyd, Breckenridge, Albert C. Brown, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chapman, Cleveland, Cullom, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Edgerton, Evans, Ewing, Faulkner, Fitch, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gaylord, Goodnow, Green, Grey, Grow, Harper, Hart, Hascall, Haven, Thos. M. Howe, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George G. King, Kuhns, Landry, Letcher, Edward C. Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McNair, Mencham, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Newton, Olds, Perkins, Polk, Porter, Price, Sackett, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Fred. P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Sweetser, Taylor, Tuck, Wallbridge, Walsh, Ward, Welch, Addison White, and Yates—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Andrews, Wm. Appleton, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bennett, Bissell, Biscoe, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Caldwell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, George T.

Davis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Dockery, Dunham, Eastman, Edmundson, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hebard, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penniman, Phelps, Rantoul, Riddle, Robbins, Robie, Robinson, Ross, Schermerhorn, Schoonmaker, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Abrahm P. Stevens, Stone, Stuart, Sutherland, Benj. Thompson, Geo. W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Williams—110.

So the motion was rejected.

The question was then taken upon referring the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means; and it was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business.

PAY TO HON. MR. DARBY.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I wish to offer a resolution, and I am sure I will get the unanimous and favorable action of this House upon it. Mr. DARBY, a Representative from the St. Louis district, came to Washington to enter upon the discharge of his duties as a Representative. On Monday morning, the 1st of December, he was suddenly and unexpectedly stricken down with paralysis; and from that time to the present moment he has been confined to his bed as an invalid and helpless as an infant. He is here now at the seat of Government, thousands of miles away from his family and friends, in this distressing and helpless condition. I feel sure that the mere mention of these facts will be sufficient to claim from the members of this House favorable action upon this resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as Mr. JOHN F. DARBY, of the First District of Missouri, has been in Washington from the commencement of the session, and been prevented by severe indisposition from taking his seat as a member of this House, that he be allowed to draw his per diem and mileage; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized to pay him the same.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution by substituting the Speaker for the Sergeant-at-Arms. It is the Speaker who has charge of the matter, and not the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business. Let us hear from Utah.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the States and Territories for petitions, commencing with the Territory of Utah.

Mr. DOTY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the State of Wisconsin, in aid of the construction of the Central Railroad; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. Subsequently, On motion by Mr. HALL, this reference was reconsidered, and the bill was committed to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McCORKLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to provide for the survey of public lands in the State of California, and for granting donations and other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the State of Alabama, in aid of the construction of the Girard railroad which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. BRAGG, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of presentation to the Senate, the joint resolution of the State of Alabama, in regard to certain reserved lands in Clarke county, in that State.

Mr. LETCHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to change the time for holding the district courts of the United States in the western district of Virginia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and, with the various petitions heretofore presented upon this subject, now on the files of the House, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING, of New York, asked permission to offer a resolution.

Mr. EVANS objected, and called for the regular order of business.

RESERVED LANDS IN IOWA.

Mr. HENN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to relinquish to the State of Iowa lands reserved for salt springs therein; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. H. I have also a resolution which I wish to offer, and I hope that it may be put upon its passage immediately, as it is a matter of importance to my constituents. It is a resolution, I apprehend, that will not be objected to by any one.

Mr. EVANS. I object.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. HENN. I have also another bill which I wish to introduce, and of which previous notice has been given. It is a bill creating three additional land districts in the State of Iowa.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to its introduction.

On motion by Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the memorial of George Simpton, praying compensation for vessels lost in the public service during the late war with Mexico, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. EVANS objected.

Mr. PHELPS asked the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given.

Mr. TUCK objected.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition from sundry citizens of Monroe country, Missouri, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Paris, through Shelbyville, to Newark, Missouri; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Robert Nelson for leave to change an entry of land; referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, gave notice that he would to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill for the improvement of the Rock Island and Des Moines Rapids on the Mississippi river.

Mr. MOLONY presented the petitions of D. Clapp and Silas Noble, register and receiver, asking for an increase of pay for locating bounty land warrants; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FICKLIN presented the petition of A. M. Patterson and one hundred others, praying the establishment of a mail route from Vincennes, in the State of Indiana, via Lawrenceville and other places, to Springfield, in Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOLONY asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to correct an error in the pension of Orris Crosby.

Objection was made, and the bill was not introduced.

Mr. GREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to provide for the repair and improvement of the dam at the head of Cumberland Island, in the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. EVANS. I wish to inquire of the Chair, if bills cannot be introduced, when States are called for resolutions, under the rule?

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House, they can be introduced at any time.

[Cries of "That is the rule!" "That is the practice."]

THE WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution, authorizing the architect of the Capitol to continue in employment the mechanics and laborers upon the two wings thereof.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask that the resolution may be read, as it contains very important matter.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. EDGERTON presented the petition of Alexander Armstrong, praying compensation for property lost during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, gave notice that on to-morrow or some subsequent day, he should ask leave to introduce a bill to amend an act of Congress, passed September 28, 1850, allowing bounty land warrants to those who served in the war with Great Britain and other wars, &c.

Also, presented the petition of the heirs of Lieutenant Joseph Parrott, an officer in the Army during the revolutionary war, praying commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. CARTTER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of A. H. Patterson, on which a favorable report was made at the last session of Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PENN presented the petition of Thomas J. Durant, of New Orleans, for the payment of a balance claimed to be due him for services as attorney of the United States, in the district of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FREEMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and donation of public lands, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern boundary of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. F. also asked unanimous consent to introduce another bill; to which objection was made.

Mr. F. I understand we have a right to introduce bills upon a call of the States?

The SPEAKER. Upon a call of the States for resolutions you have, but not upon a call for petitions.

Mr. FREEMAN. I should like to know why objection is made to the introduction of this bill, when other gentlemen have been permitted to introduce bills?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. Objection being made, the bill cannot be introduced.

Mr. WILCOX presented the petition of the register and receiver at Augusta, Mississippi, praying for additional compensation for locating military bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. DISNEY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Captain Linn and heirs of Joshua Huddy be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. SACKETT, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Reynolds and others, for the improvement of the harbor of Putneyville, on Lake Ontario, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COBB asked the general consent of the House to introduce the following bills, viz:

A bill granting the right of way and alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Selma to the Tennessee river;

A bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Mississippi and Alabama, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad; and

A bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands belonging to the United States, and for other purposes.

Objection was made.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama, presented the petition of William M. Lapsley, of Alabama, asking compensation for services rendered as receiver at the land office at Cahaba, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OUTLAW presented the petition of C. B. Hassell, and 831 others, citizens of North Carolina, praying Congress to abolish the office of Chaplain to the two Houses, and in the Army and Navy of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, presented the petition of R. W. Wynn, John Webb, and others, to establish a post-road from Bastrop, in the parish of Morehouse, Louisiana, to Winnsborough, in the parish of Franklin, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Louisiana, in regard to awarding the contract for carrying the mail, to such company as may have the right of crossing the Isthmus of Tehuantepec by the shortest and most expeditious route; and also praying for an appropriation to survey the said route from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, in Tehuantepec; which was read and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of Jehiel Brook, praying for authority to sue the United States for damages for a suit instituted against him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORSE, of Louisiana, gave notice that on to-morrow, or on some other day, he would ask leave to introduce a bill making appropriation for the removal of the raft in Red river.

Mr. WALSH asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Objected to.

Mr. BOWIE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia inquire into the expediency of preventing the issue of small notes, under the denomination of five dollars, in the District of Columbia, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On motion by Mr. GROW, it was Ordered, That the papers and petitions of Conrad Hines and others, for recompense for the services of Captain Bartlett Hines in the revolutionary war, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. ALLISON presented the memorial of John Crosby, administrator of the late A. D. Crosby, purser in the United States Navy, praying to be allowed a credit to his account for payment made to certain warrant officers; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of James A. Fawns, praying that he may be allowed the salary of purser while acting as such on board the United States brig Bainbridge, on the coast of Brazil; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of James W. Wilkins, praying to be allowed the salary of purser for the time he performed the duties of that office during the late war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. FULLER, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the heirs of Samuel Ransom be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CURTIS presented the petition of Samuel Baker, a soldier of the last war, praying that he may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FLORENCE presented the petition of Buckingham Hoty, administrator of Peter Hoty, praying for an examination of the proceedings of the Board of Commissioners on claims against Mexico, in relation to a claim presented to them and rejected; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for the enactment of a law to prevent the immigration of foreign paupers into the United States. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, for an appropriation to erect a harbor and piers in the Delaware bay and river, for the shelter of vessels navigating them. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for a modification of the bounty land law of 1850, so as to give 160 acres of land to those and the children of those officers and soldiers who served the war of 1812. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Benjamin Holbrook, of Philadelphia, asking indemnity for the loss of a vessel in the service of the United States. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the petition of John Duncan, a blind sailor, who lost his sight in the service of the United States, asking for a pension.

Also, the memorial of the route agents of the Post Office Department, asking for an increase of compensation. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PRICE asked leave to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given.

Mr. EVANS objected.

Mr. PRICE claimed that, under the 44th rule, he had the right to introduce the bill.

The SPEAKER decided that the bill could not be introduced, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to lay the appeal on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE presented a petition from sundry citizens of Newark, New Jersey, asking the passage of a law giving proper remedies to patentees; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. P. also gave notice that he would, at the earliest day practicable, ask leave to introduce a bill for the purpose of giving proper remedies to patentees.

Mr. HASCALL presented the petition of Mary Hascall, the widow of Benjamin Hascall, a soldier of the Revolution, asking for a pension; which, with the papers on the files of the House upon the same subject, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEYMOUR presented the petition of John Burlason, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the memorial of certain officers and soldiers in the war of 1812, praying for relief. Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, presented additional papers in the case of Thomas Thooly; which, with those on the files of the House in regard to said claim, were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HORSFORD presented the petition of Peter Van Buskirk, asking pay for property furnished to the American troops during the revolutionary war. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BENNETT presented a petition for a mail route from Vallonia Springs, via Minerva and Coventry, to Oxford. Referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. CLEVELAND, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Dr. Avery Downer, a surgeon's mate in the revolutionary war, with the bill No. 74, and report No. 44 of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, of the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. MANN presented the petition of Jesse French, of Braintree; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. SIBLEY presented the papers relative to the claim for compensation of the volunteers who served in the suppression of the Winnebago hostilities in July, 1850; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. GAYLORD, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of presenting to the Senate, the petition and papers of Zachariah Lawrence.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports; when

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company; which was read a first and second time by its title, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

THE WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a joint resolution authorizing the architect of the Capitol to continue in employment the mechanics, laborers, and others employed upon the two wings thereof.

The resolution was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STANTON remarked that the appropriation for the additions to the Capitol had been exhausted, and that some three hundred mechanics and laborers—some of them with large families—who had been brought on to Washington under the expectation of permanent employment, had been discharged. They had been thrown out of employment, too, in the most inclement season of the year, without the means of support and without any hope of employment elsewhere. He would appeal to the House to pass the resolution immediately. He had been told by the Architect that they could be profitably employed. They were willing to work and await the appropriation by Congress. He hoped the resolution would be put on its passage.

Mr. CARTTER. Will the chairman of the committee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CARTTER. We are informed by the chairman of the committee that the funds appropriated are all expended. Can he give the House any information as to the fact that a large portion of that money has been expended in sending to the Catskill mountains for lime to lay these foundations with, when there is an abundance of lime within sight of the Capitol? I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee could throw any light upon that subject.

Mr. STANTON. The House, and perhaps the country too, know that I have had some little experience in this matter of lime, having used a great deal of it when I was a boy and growing up. I have seen this lime that has been so much talked about, and I declare to the House that I have never seen better lime in my life. I think the architect, the Secretary of the Interior, and the other agents engaged in making the contract, did well in selecting this lime, for it is preferable to any other that I have ever seen in this neighborhood or elsewhere.

I do not know what amount of money has been expended in the purchase of lime; but I know that a great deal of work has been done, and that a great deal of material has been accumulated with the $100,000 appropriated a year ago. A great deal more work has been done, and a larger quantity of material accumulated, than I expected to see.

Mr. CARTTER. I would like to ask the gentleman an additional question, and that is: What is the cost per bushel of this lime which has been used, and what is the cost of the lime which could be obtained within sight of the Capitol? I am informed that there has been a little speculation about this matter.

Mr. STANTON. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. BELL. I have but a word to say upon this subject. I do not wish to throw any impediment in the way of the progress of this work, but I wish to inquire of the gentleman who drew up this resolution whether the language in which it is couched would not make it obligatory upon the agent to continue in pay every hand who is now or has been engaged upon this work?

Mr. STANTON. It was certainly not so intended by me, and if the resolution is susceptible of such a construction I have no objection whatever to its modification so as to obviate that difficulty.

[A message was received from the Senate, accompanied by the bill, which had passed that body to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States in California.]

Mr. BELL. Then I understand that the gentleman is willing to accept of a modification of his resolution?

Mr. STANTON. I will accept of a modification if it is in my power to do so, but as this is a report from a committee I presume that I have not the power.

The SPEAKER. As the resolution is a report from a committee, it is not in the power of the gentleman to modify it.

Mr. FICKLIN. I have listened with a good deal of pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman who has introduced this resolution—

Mr. SACKETT, (interposing.) If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I will suggest to the mover of the resolution that he should modify it by the addition of these words: "If he shall think advantageous to the Government." That will relieve the resolution from the objection suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. FICKLIN. The modification that is suggested does not make the resolution acceptable to me. There is a passage in the preamble which will certainly prevent the resolution from receiving my vote. What is that preamble? The preamble states that whereas these individuals have been thrown out of employment, and cannot at this season of the year obtain employment elsewhere, be it therefore resolved to quarter them upon the Government. That is the proposition when stripped of the verbiage by which it is surrounded. It is a plain, simple proposition to quarter these individuals upon the Government during the winter, because they cannot now find employment elsewhere. Every hand that has been engaged upon this work will be willing to remain in the service or in the pay of the Government, and their clamor will induce the superintendent to continue them in the pay of the Government.

My honorable friend over the way [Mr. BELL] inquired if this resolution made it obligatory upon the Superintendent to continue these hands in employment. This resolution, together with the clamor that will be sent up to him, will prevent him from discharging any one of them. I am opposed to the passage of this resolution; and I would inquire of my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] in whose charge is this expenditure? Is this building under the charge of the Superintendent, or is it not under the charge of other officers of the Government?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. It is under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Architect. The Architect has charge of the building, of the employment of hands, and of the payment of the money.

Mr. FICKLIN. Well, then, if the Secretary of the Interior deems it proper to continue this work during the winter, and to keep these hands in employment, let him take the responsibility of asking Congress to make an appropriation for that purpose. We can do it in an hour from the time that he makes his application. But this resolution places it in the power of the Superintendent to keep all these hands in the employment of the Government during the winter.

I am opposed to the passage of the resolution at present, at all events, and in order that its merits may be examined into and its demerits ascertained, if there be any attached to it, I ask its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The preamble and resolution were read; as follows:

Whereas, in consequence of the exhaustion of the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement of the Capitol, a large number of mechanics, laborers, and others employed there have been discharged, and are thrown out of service at a season of the year when employment cannot be obtained elsewhere,

Be it therefore resolved, That the architect of the Capitol be and he is hereby authorized to continue in service, until an appropriation shall hereafter be made, as many of the mechanics, laborers, and others who have been employed in the extension of the Capitol as shall be willing to remain in service and await any appropriation which may be hereafter made by Congress for their pay.

Mr. SACKETT. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw that motion for a moment to allow me to propose a modification of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. FICKLIN. Permit me to suggest to my friend from New York, that as this resolution is a report from a committee, the gentleman who offered it cannot modify it.

Mr. SACKETT. I can move an amendment, I suppose?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. VENABLE. There may be the very best reason in the world why these workmen should be retained. If that reason was the preservation of the public work, and if that work was likely to be injured or destroyed unless this resolution was adopted, I might, perhaps, very cheerfully vote for it. But I never can vote for the employment of these men for the reasons set forth in this resolution. I never can consent to recognize, by my vote, the principle that it is the primary duty of this Government to afford work to anybody. I am opposed to Fourierism in all its shapes; and I repeat that I never can recognize it as a primary duty of this Government to supply people that are out of employment with work. If these men have made a contract with the undertaker of this work, and the money appropriated by the Government is exhausted, they must take their luck, as others do. When the people in my country get out of work, they never come to Congress and ask to be provided with employment, and they have never recognized the principle that it is the business of this Government to take money out of the Treasury to supply people who are out of work, or idle people with the means of living. If it can be satisfactorily shown that the adoption of this resolution is necessary for the protection of the public works, I will cheerfully give it my support. But here is the bald proposition introduced into this House, and placed before the country, that because these men are out of employment and cannot find work, it is therefore our duty to authorize the creation of a debt upon the Treasury, and to permit the architect, or superintendent of the work, to employ these men upon the faith of the promise of Congress that an appropriation shall be made hereafter for their payment.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] that this resolution had better be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that it may be put in a proper form, and that it may not go forth that this House has sanctioned the doctrine that it is a primary duty of the Government of the United States to furnish those who are out of work with employment.

Mr. FICKLIN. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] I wish to suggest to him that this resolution takes the responsibility from the Secretary of the Interior, and interposes between him and his duty to this Government.

Mr. VENABLE. I was about to make that very remark. I am one of those who believe in the responsibility of agents. I believe that you ought to fix the duties of your agent, and hold him responsible for the discharge of those duties. I never will, by any vote of mine, step in between him and his responsibility, so that if there is mismanagement, a waste of the public funds, or a direction given to those funds that was not contemplated by the act of Congress, he can shelter himself by saying, "I was doing exactly what the law required, and you stepped in and interfered with me." No; let us hold the Department of the Interior responsible for this work. If they need a further appropriation; if the works need protection; or if there be sound and good reasons for an additional appropriation, let the information come from the Department, and let us have the reasons before us on which we are to act.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina, whether there is not an estimate from the Department for the continuation of this work? If so, is there any good reason why the work should stop during the present season? Would it not be for the public interest to let the work go on in anticipation of the appropriation which has been asked for by the Department?

Mr. VENABLE. I have no disposition whatever to obstruct or to arrest the execution of this work, but I do protest most solemnly against the admission of the principle, in our legislation, that it is a primary duty of this Government to furnish work to those who are in need of employment.

Mr. FLORENCE, (interrupting.) Here are a number of persons who have come from the different States of the Union—having given up employment elsewhere—under the impression that they could have continued employment here. I apprehend that every one of them earns all that he obtains for his labor. I apprehend that every one of them feels at the close of his day's work, that he has performed his duty to himself and to the Government, and would despise the idea that he had "quartered himself" upon the Government.

The prospect was held out to these men—from the fact that the building of these Capitol wings would be continued for years—that they would have permanent employment here. And I desire to say, on behalf of these persons, that they would not think for a single moment, of "quartering themselves upon the Government" without rendering what some one has called a quid pro quo.

Mr. VENABLE. All that is nothing new to me. I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the character of these men or the calculations which they may have made. Arguments of that sort ought to have no influence here. These men appear before us just like any other laborers. I have exactly as much respect for them as I have for any other honest laborers. If they made a contract with the agent of the Government to work for a certain number of days, they ought to be paid for that work, but if they made a bargain to work as long as the money which had been appropriated lasted, and that money is now exhausted, they have worked out their contract, and we have not deceived them or withheld anything from them which they had a right to expect, however respectable they may be, or however unwilling to quarter themselves on the Government—and I freely admit that they are so. I say again, that if that resolution is passed for the reason given upon its face, that these men have been thrown out of employment, and cannot at this season obtain employment elsewhere, it is a recognition of the principle that it is a primary duty of this Government to furnish men who are out of work with employment. To such a principle, I for one, can never give my sanction.

Mr. SACKETT. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to submit an amendment?

Mr. VENABLE. I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. SACKETT. I suppose that this work is under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the motion now pending is not a motion to refer this resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. That is the question now pending before the House.

Mr. SACKETT. That motion was withdrawn.

Mr. FICKLIN. No, sir; I have not withdrawn it.

The SPEAKER. The first question put to the House will be upon the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. VENABLE. And I am entitled to the floor, and was discussing the propriety of that very reference. This resolution is, in my opinion, properly referable to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There the whole subject can be examined and discussed, and the report can be amended. The resolution makes an appropriation, and it must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

I should not have opened my mouth upon this subject, except to have voted for the reference, but I could not consent to remain silent, and thus appear to recognize the principle involved in this resolution, that it is a sufficient reason for the employment of anybody that he is out of work. As has been justly remarked by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FICKLIN,] the effect of this resolution, and of the clamor and pressure from without, would be that the Superintendent would continue in employment every one of these individuals.

Economy must begin somewhere. Responsibility with regard to the expenditure of the public funds must be fixed somewhere, and as we have fixed the responsibility of this expenditure in the Department of the Interior, and as the appropriation is exhausted, I am unwilling to make a further appropriation until it is applied for by the Department. While, therefore, I am not opposed to the continuance of this work, I am not disposed to further it in violation of the rules of this body, and of proper rules of economy. Let the whole subject come before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is better that these workmen should be without employment for a day or two than that we should violate the rules of prudence and economy.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which main question was on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FICKLIN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 93, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, William Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bell, Bissell, Boocock, Brenton, Buell, Caldwell, Carter, Caskey, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dinmick, Dunham, Edgerton, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Haven, Henn, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, Houston, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Leitcher, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McMillin, McNair, Molony, John Moore, Murray, Nabors, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Phelps, Porter, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Robert Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Welch, and Wilcox—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Allison, Thomas H. Bayly, Bennett, Bilghaus, Bowne, John H. Boyd, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Chapman, George T. Davis, Doty, Edmundson, Evans, Ewing, Florence, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gaylord, Green, Hammond, Harper, Haws, Hebard, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, George G. King, Mann, McCorkle, Meacham, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Samuel W. Parker, Polk, Price, Kiddle, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Skelton, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Williams, and Yates—53.

So the joint resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. WALSH moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the joint resolution just referred thereto.

The question was taken upon this motion; and on a division, there were—yeas 55, nays 51. No quorum voting.

On motion by Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, the House then adjourned.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. YATES: A bill making appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois river.

By Mr. BROWN of Mississippi: A bill to perpetuate pre-emptions to actual settlers on the public lands.

Also, a bill to grant the right of way and make a donation of public lands to the States of Mississippi and Louisiana, in aid of the construction of a railroad from New Orleans, Louisiana, to Jackson, Mississippi.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following memorials, petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BOWIE: A memorial of Charles Fletcher, of Lancaster, on behalf of himself and others, praying for a charter to build a railroad, through the District of Columbia, in a northwestern course to the Maryland line.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of Johnston Lawrence and 33 others, praying for a new mail route from Powhatan Point, in Belmont county, to Malaga, in Monroe county, Ohio.

By Mr. TOWNSEND: The memorial of Leonard Skinner, presenting his claim to back pay and bounty land.

By Mr. SCHERMERHORN: The petition of Capt. Thos. Duor, praying pay for money advanced while in the service of the United States during the late war with Great Britain.

By Mr. DOTY: The petition of A. W. Clarke, J. E. Garland, J. B. Winchell and others, praying for a mail route from Princeton, in Wisconsin, to Weyanwewa.

By Mr. ROBBINS: A memorial signed by James Devaux, Samuel C. Morton and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the construction of a harbor on the eastern side of Reedy Island, in the Delaware river, where substantial piers would be erected at a moderate expense, which would afford shelter to vessels navigating said river.

By Mr. MILLSON: The petition of Nelson H. Hodges, heir of Wm. Hodges, deceased, asking remuneration for injury to property while in the occupation of the troops of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain.

Also, the petition of Henry and Robert Blow, heirs of Henry Blow, deceased, asking arrears of pension due deceased.

Also, the memorial of Thomas Robinson and others, "forward officers" of the Navy, asking that their pay may be graduated according to sea service.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1851.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Hon. WILLIE P. MANGUM, from the State of North Carolina, attended in his seat.

NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th March last, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform Congress, at the earliest date, whether any arrangements are in progress, or likely to be made, with Great Britain and the British Provinces of North America, for securing to the citizens of the United States the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, St. John, and other large rivers, and the right to enjoy freely, in common with British subjects, the sea and coast fisheries of the British fisheries of the British North American Colonies.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CASE OF MR. THRASHER IN CUBA.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, requesting information in regard to the imprisonment of John S. Thrasher, at Havana, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents which accompanied it.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, December 16, 1851.

The message was read.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and be printed.

THE CASE OF THE PROMETHEUS.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received a resolution of the Senate, adopted upon the 12th instant, in the following terms:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not inconsistent with the public interest, any information the Executive may have received respecting the firing into and seizure of the American steamship Prometheus by a British vessel of war, in November last, near Grey Town, on the Mosquito Coast; and, also, what measures have been taken by the Executive to ascertain the state of the fact and to vindicate the honor of the country."

In answer to this request, I submit to the Senate the accompanying extracts from a communication addressed to the Department of State by Mr. Joseph L. White, as counsel of the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship Canal Company, dated 2d instant.

This communication is the principal source of the information received by the Executive in relation to the subject alluded to, and is presumed to be essentially correct in its statement of the facts. Upon receiving this communication, instructions, such as the occasion seemed to demand, were immediately dispatched to the Minister of the United States in London. Sufficient time has not elapsed for the return of any answer to this dispatch from him; and, in my judgment, it would at the present moment be inconsistent with the public interest to communicate those instructions. A communication, however, of all the correspondence will be made to the Senate at the earliest moment at which a proper regard to the public interest will permit.

At the same time instructions were given to Commodore Parker, commanding the home squadron, a copy of which, so far as they relate to the case of the Prometheus, is herewith transmitted to the Senate.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

The message was read.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, requesting the communication of a dispatch addressed to the Department of State by Mr. Niles, late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Turin, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, which is accompanied by a copy of the dispatch.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, 16th December, 1851.

The message was read.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF WAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, accompanied by statements showing the expenditures from the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the offices and bureaus of that Department; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th February last, a report of the Chief of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, giving the rules for the government of that corps, and the duties on which each officer has been employed since 1838; which was read.

On motion by Mr. BORLAND,

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

PETITION.

Mr. CIIASE presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying an amendment to the laws relating to the diplomatic intercourse between the United States and foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the petition of Zachariah Lawrence, praying compensation for the capture of a British sloop called the Venture, during the last war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DOWNS presented a petition of the late and present land officers at Monroe, Louisiana, praying additional compensation for locating bounty land warrants.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of the officers of the United States sloop-of-war Falmouth, attached to the Pacific squadron, praying extra pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a document relating to the claim of Mariano G. Vallejo to indemnity for property taken for the use of the United States troops under the command of Captain J. C. Frémont; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLEMENS presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying the sale of reserved lands in Clark county in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the memorial of Peter G. Washington, John F. C. Saloman, and William Selden, proposing to enter into a contract for supplying the cities of Washington and Georgetown with water from the Potomac river, above Georgetown; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition from citizens of the districts of Kershaw and Lancaster, South Carolina, praying the establishment of a mail route from Camden, in that State, to Monroe, in North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of Benjamin H. Mooers, for himself and the other heirs of Benjamin Mooers, deceased, an officer in the revolutionary Army, praying to be allowed the depreciation on the commutation certificates issued to their ancestor in lieu of his half-pay for life; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I have been requested to present a memorial, signed by a large number of the citizens of the United States, praying for the restoration of the law authorizing prompt and summary punishment for petty offences in the Navy and commercial marine. I understand the petitioners to pray for the restoration of the law authorizing flogging. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am quite amazed, Mr. President, at that paper. I did not believe it possible that so many people in Philadelphia could have been found to sign such a memorial as that seems to be. I hardly know at this moment of surprise what to say in relation to it. It is a very important matter, which is presented to the Senate, in reference to which I ought not, perhaps, inconsiderately to discourse. I cannot but remember that the State of New Jersey was one of the first in the Union which approved those important amendments to the Constitution of the United States which secured freedom of religion, of speech, and the right to petition, and which has so securely guarded the State sovereignties from encroachments by the General Government. For myself, I yield to no man in respect to the right of petition; and as long as truth is permitted to combat error, I will throw no obstacles in its way. Sir, if there be a right to petition the Senate upon such a subject, I suppose it is entirely within the power of the Senate to take what action they may think proper upon it; and therefore perhaps it would be most prudent for me to postpone the expression of my opinions, and ask that for the present the memorial should be laid upon the table, with the view of taking it up again for discussion on Tuesday next. By adopting this course, I shall have an opportunity of reading the memorial. In the mean time, I give notice to those who may be in favor of the measure, that I will fight it from the start. Sir, I am entirely opposed to any such proposition; and move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. What is the prayer of the petition?

Mr. STOCKTON. To lick the sailors.

The PRESIDENT. If the memorial is laid upon the table, it can be called up at any time.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to lay it on the table, and let it lie there.

The motion to lay the memorial on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN, at a subsequent period of the day, rose and said: Mr. President, I wish to make a remark respecting a memorial which was presented this morning by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRODHEAD]; praying for a restoration of flogging in the Navy. Before that memorial shall be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, it will be desirable to know whether it is intended to restore flogging, or to substitute any other system of punishment in the Navy. That the opinion of the Senate may be expressed on this subject, I give notice that I shall call up the memorial on Tuesday next, and I hope the Senator from New Jersey will then be ready to debate it.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Sylvester Churchill, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Charles Lewis, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Dunning, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. BRADBURY, it was Ordered, That the petition of John O. Means, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the application of John Schley, for a renewal of a patent, be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of George Talcott, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of J. K. Rogers, legal representative of David Cordery, deceased, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the legal representatives of John Moore, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the Italian Mutual Benevolent Society of New Orleans, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. MANGUM gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the personal representatives of William A. Slacum.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENTS versus MONARCHIES.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

Whereas the signs of the times are portentous of an approaching struggle in Europe between the republican masses, for constitutional governments on the one side, and the advocates of monarchies for absolute governments on the other; and whereas it pressingly behooves the representatives of the American people of the united sovereign States of America to seriously consider, and sometimes to inquire into the relations of the Government and the country to this struggle, and their duty, in view of it, to themselves, to foreign nations, and the international law: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into, and report upon, the expediency of an open declaration by Congress to foreign nations and the world, that the United States hold strictly to the policy and principle, that each individual, nation, state, or power, possesses for itself the exclusive right, and sole power, to take care and dispose of its own internal concerns, without and exempt from the intervention and interference of any foreign government, state, confederacy, alliance, or power whatsoever, and that any such intervention or interference by, or on the part of, any foreign government, state, confederacy, alliance, or power, constitutes an infraction of the law of nations, authorizing and justifying the interposition of any or all other governments, confederacies, or powers, at their discretion, to prevent such intervention, and to repair such infraction of the law of nations.

Resolved, further, That the same committee be instructed to inquire also into the expediency of requesting the President of the United States to cause negotiations to be opened with all other constitutional governments, with a view and to the end of obtaining their coöperation with the United States in the declaration aforesaid, and the policy and principle thereof, and in the observance, defence, and maintenance of the law of nations in this respect.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of William P. Greene, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of William P. Greene.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of John A. McGaw, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill granting relief to John A. McGaw, of New York.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill supplementary to the several acts of Congress providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in that State, reported it with an amendment.

COMPENSATION OF TREASURERS.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, for the additional services required under that act, reported it without amendment.

It will take but little time, said the honorable gentleman, to dispose of this bill, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up for consideration now. It was passed during the last session of the Senate. It is designed to provide compensation for a class of officers who were omitted to be provided for by the act of 1846—I mean that class who were designated as the "depositors." This bill having passed the Senate last year, probably failed in the House because it only reached that body in the regular order of business.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The bill was then considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and there being no amendment thereto, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS, agreeable to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Charles A. Kellett; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill for the relief of Enoch Baldwin and others; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WIDOW OF GENERAL WORTH.

The Senate, on the motion of Mr. BORLAND, proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Margaret L. Worth.

Mr. HALE. Is there any report accompanying that bill? If there be, I should like to have it read.

Mr. BORLAND. There was no report in the case. It was a bill introduced by me last session of Congress granting a pension to the widow of General Worth. There was no report necessary in the case. The facts were known to all. His position in the Army, the circumstances of his death, his great merit as an officer, added to her claims to support under these circumstances, she was generally regarded as deserving of the care and sympathy and relief of the Government. There were no facts beyond these necessary to be set forth in a report, and these facts were in the knowledge of every Senator. For this reason no report was made. When the bill was reported from the committee, I asked for its consideration. It was passed in the Senate and went to the House, but failed there for want of time, not coming up in the regular order of business. One reason why I ask for its passage by the Senate now is, that I learn from members of the House that it can be passed in that branch of Congress at an early day, and thus afford relief to the widow of one of the most gallant officers ever known in our Army—relief of which she stands eminently in need.

Mr. HALE. I am by no means opposed to the passage of the bill, and shall not make any objections. My reason for inquiring whether there was any report was this, that I know the circumstances under which it was reported last session. I know, also, that a bill was introduced for the relief of the widow of another distinguished officer—I mean the widow of General McNeil. When that bill came up, it did not go quite so easy, and I want to know if there is anything peculiar in the two cases. I supposed that if there was anything peculiar which could distinguish the one case from the other, that peculiarity would have been set forth in the report.

Mr. BORLAND. I will not prolong the discussion on this bill, but will merely answer the Senator from New Hampshire, by remarking that I know of no peculiar feature in the bill for the relief of the widow of General McNeil which should prevent its passage. That bill will soon be reported by the committee, and it shall have my support. But I cannot conceive how that bill can have anything to do with this.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe that I made an objection to the bill for the relief of the widow of General McNeil, and I also object to this. It is the introduction of the principle to which I object—that of pensioning the widows of distinguished men by making them exceptions to general laws, and of legislating upon each particular case without a general law. That is the principle we are introducing in this case, and in others like it, and therefore I am opposed to it. But I have made opposition to this principle so often, and yet so ineffectually, that I know the inutility of renewing that opposition now, and therefore I surrender the point, merely expressing my disapprobation of all bills of the kind.

Mr. SEWARD. If were possible to frame a general law embracing cases so meritorious as this and no others, I would agree with the honorable Senator from Kentucky. But I despair of ever seeing any such law; and because it is only by special legislation that we can obtain the attention of Congress to a case so peculiarly meritorious as this, if such a general law were passed; and because other applications less meritorious in their character than this would often obtain an equal consideration under it, I think it is right, and proper, and wise, to consider these cases separately. I think it just to single out for favor such as come recommended to the consideration of the Government by the magnitude and heroism of services rendered, and the destitution of families bereaved.

Those cases which have not merit will undoubtedly fail by the way. I therefore cordially support the proposition contained in the bill. I shall record my vote for it now, and I shall be equally happy to record it on its final passage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from New York has expressed a wish to have an opportunity of recording his vote in favor of this bill, and I wish to give him that opportunity, as well as to have myself an opportunity of recording my vote against the principle, and therefore I will ask for the yeas and nays. I wish to ascertain the sense of the Senate on this matter—because I think it will save time and expense hereafter—whether they will undertake to legislate in particular cases, and grant pensions when there are no general laws authorizing it. I believe that if we introduce this principle, it will lead to more partiality, more favoritism, and interfere more with the regular legislation of Congress, than almost anything else that we can do. And, Mr. President, my experience has been that there is hardly any case where you bring forward the claims of the individual, and present him or her with the wants by which he or she is surrounded to the sympathies of Congress—I say, there is hardly any individual case which may be thus presented, which will not be provided for; and if you begin to act in this way, without a general principle, you will consume the whole time of Congress in these individual gratuities. Sir, what was the case of Charlotte Lynch? I had occasion, the other day, to mention that case.

Mr. HALE. And upon that I had occasion to meet you.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Sir, that case illustrates the whole condition of things. An accomplished lady—

Mr. HALE, (in his seat.) Certainly, a poetess.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir, a poetess, intermingling and associating with members of Congress, making a deep impression upon them by her merits in every way; and, sir, it required all my firmness to resist an application of that sort, and I own that I was near giving way myself. (Laughter.) Now, sir, you present an individual case, man or woman, and you have eloquent appeals made in favor of that man or that woman, and the consequence is that you give the gratuity which may be asked for. And, sir, with reference to this, we had an illustration the other day. One of my good constituents, who, upon the principle of that bill is entitled to receive fifteen or twenty thousand dollars from the Treasury, was represented by me here the other day. I was advocating his cause on that precedent, and my friend to the left [Mr. HALE] shook his head and said that we had gone far enough. Now, sir, let us have the yeas and nays. And I will say that if you go it in this case, I shall make no resistance, but will say go it in all. Sir, we have innumerable widows to provide for; and if from the fact of their being the widows of meritorious and distinguished men you are to provide for them all upon the same footing, you will have claims upon you enough to bankrupt any treasury. If, then, gentlemen wish to set the example in this case, I assure them that I will not trouble them hereafter with speeches upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to take the yeas and nays upon the engrossment of the bill? I suppose that is his proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

The question was then taken on the call for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to say one word, although it is not my purpose to say anything in relation to this bill, but simply in response to a remark made by the Senator from Kentucky. I insist that in asking for the passage of this bill we do not seek the introduction of any new principle. It may indeed be a new principle, according to the letter of the law, but it certainly is not so according to the spirit of the law; for our present law grants pensions to the widows of all officers and soldiers who are killed in battle, or who die of their wounds or of disease contracted while in the service of their country. Now, sir, it is true that General Worth was not killed in battle; but I do insist upon it, and say it upon my personal knowledge, as well as upon the knowledge of others, that he returned from Mexico, after having fought the battles of his country, broken down with disease, suffering from wounds received in former battles, and in that condition was ordered to Texas, in the face of the cholera, and he fell before it—marching to San Antonio—a more formidable enemy than any he had ever encountered on the field of battle—leaving his family, whom he had not been able to take care of for more than thirty years, destitute of the common comforts of life. I contend, then, that Mrs. Worth is eminently entitled to receive this pension. I say, also, that there is no new principle, nor any new precedent, involved in the proposition, because we have done the same thing for other widows. This sum of $50 per month, is precisely the sum which was given to the widow of Commodore Decatur. That is the sum which was asked and obtained in that case, and that case can be claimed as a precedent, if necessary, so that the consciences of gentlemen may be relieved on the score of want of precedent. I have no more to say.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill, and resulted—yeas 38, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Butler, Chase, Clemens, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foot of Vermont, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Norris, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Upham, Wade, and Walker—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Dawson, Hunter, King, Pratt, and Underwood—5.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolution declaring the measures of adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of slavery.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I do not know that I should have taken part in the debate on this resolution, but that I have thought it proper, and perhaps necessary, to place myself right upon some questions which have arisen heretofore, and were adverted to at a former period by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FORTA], in reference to

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1851.

NEW SERIES.... No. 8.

the action of certain Senators from the Southern States, myself included, upon the bill for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, which passed during the last Congress, and which formed one of that series of measures which some gentlemen term the compromise. In order that I may be distinctly understood upon this question, I will ask the permission of the Senate to read the remarks made by the Senator from Mississippi during the present session, so far as they refer to it. Those remarks, as reported, were as follow:

"It is also not forgotten by me, and I hope that it is not forgotten by the Senate either, that this particular act would have been passed by the two Houses of Congress at a much earlier period of the session before the last than it was, but for the fact that it was not deemed politic by certain Southern Senators, who had special charge of the subject, to report a bill for the reception and restoration of fugitives from service until it should be ascertained that all the other questions connected with the subject of domestic slavery were likely to be satisfactorily disposed of in Congress. The Senate will remember my former exposition of this matter here, and cannot have forgotten my statement of an important matter of fact connected with this delicate point, when I declared, in hearing of honorable Senators from the South, who could not deny the truth of what I said, that the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] and other Senators from the States of the North, now present, and whom I could easily name, requested me to see the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and the Senator from South Carolina, to whom I am now replying, at a very early day of the session then in progress, and to urge upon them both the importance of their reporting a bill without delay which, when it should become a law, would secure full justice to the South in regard to fugitives from service, pledging themselves to vote for any bill which should be thus reported, which should be free from constitutional objections. The motives of honorable Senators in not reporting this bill earlier I have never arraigned, nor do I on the present occasion. They were doubtless conscientious in their action, though I thought them at the time injudicious in the course adopted by them, as I still do; the reason given me for delaying the reporting of this bill, that if the question involved therein should be satisfactorily adjusted at that time, it might prove impossible thereafter to rouse the border States to energetic action in coöperation with the other Southern States, for the vindication of their essential rights, never having been considered by me to be of a character sufficiently solid to entitle it to operate potentially upon the deliberations of Congress."

Such is the reference made to this subject by the Senator from Mississippi, as contained in the report from which I read. He said there, and said correctly, that a like reference had been made to the same subject at a former time, his purpose being then, as it was the other day, to show that those Senators who it was supposed had the most particular charge of the bill adverted to, had not brought it forward or pressed it upon the consideration of the Senate in such a manner as the Senator from Mississippi, and those Northern Senators with whom he advised, deemed it became them to do. I have looked back to his former reference to this subject, and desire now to give a history of the action of the Senate on that bill, and of the agency of those having it in charge, so far as the same has been questioned by the Senator—that series of measures to which I have adverted, and which is called "the compromise." It is well known that this batch of measures had been aggregated into one bill, called, after the fashion of the day, the "omnibus," and that from being overloaded, or the passengers quarreling by the way, the omnibus broke down, and each measure was left to take care of itself. They were separated. A great effort had been made to keep them together. But it failed; and each bill stood upon its own merits. The bill for the admission of California passed August 13, 1850. It had on the day previous been ordered to a third reading. On the same day it passed, a motion was made by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] chairman of the Committee on Territories, to take up, as next in order, the bill providing a government for the Territory of New Mexico. The Senator from South Carolina, at the head of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BUTLER]—the committee that reported the fugitive slave bill—interposed, and said that, according to his view, the bill for the reclamation of fugitive slaves had the precedence, and should be taken up next in order. It was at that time that the Senator from Mississippi took the first notice of what he supposed, and it would appear yet supposes, to have been some delinquency, either on the part of the Senator from South Carolina, who had reported the bill, or on my part, I having introduced it, in pressing it upon the attention of the Senate. The Senator from Mississippi stated, on that occasion, as he has stated now, that at a former period of that session he had been specially applied to by some Senators from the northern States, among whom he instanced the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] who had suggested to him to confer with those Senators who had charge of the bill, upon the propriety and expediency of bringing it forward and urging its passage; that he made that application to me, amongst others; and that it was declined. I do not recollect such application, though I have no doubt of the fact, as the Senator from Mississippi has said so. But I have just as little doubt that various conversations took place between the Senator and myself, and other Senators and myself, upon the expediency and wisdom, as things then stood, of bringing on this fugitive slave bill in advance of the other measures with which it had been connected, and urging it upon the attention of the Senate. What my reply to him was I do not know. I have no doubt, however, if the Senator's memory is accurate, that he has reported it correctly. I shall come presently to that.

I wish to show now from the record, because I am desirous that it may go before the country, what steps were taken in reference to that fugitive slave bill; how they progressed, and where they terminated. I have had reference to the register, and find that on the 3d of January, 1850—a very early day after the Senate met—I gave notice of my intention to introduce that bill. It was introduced January 4th, and on the same day, on my motion, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. January 16th the chairman of that committee reported it to the Senate. January 22d I offered an amendment to it, which, at my instance, was laid on the table and printed. I should say, however, that on the 16th of January, the day upon which the chairman of the committee reported the bill, it was on his motion made the special order of the day for January 23d, one week off. On the 23d, as appears from the register, other business interposed, and, on the motion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the special order was deferred until the next day. On the 24th the bill was debated pretty much at length by the chairman of the committee who reported it. The Senate on that day adjourned until Monday, the 28th, when I engaged in the debate and spoke at length on the bill. On the 29th, (the next day,) the very distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] whose absence from the deliberations of this body, and its cause, we all deplore, introduced his resolutions for the purpose of covering all the subjects then before the Senate arising out of the institution of domestic slavery, and on his motion they were made the special order of the day for the 5th of February, six days off. On that day, the Senator from Kentucky addressed the Senate upon the subject of his resolutions, and continued that address during the next day, occupying the 5th and 6th. The debate continued on these resolutions, and on the 13th of February the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE] gave notice that he should at an early day, move for a special committee to which the entire subject should be referred. On the 25th, the debate still continuing on those resolutions, the Senator from Mississippi moved this reference. The debate then continued upon the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and upon resolutions of like character offered in the mean time by a Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] in connection with the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi to refer them.

Now, as to the fugitive slave bill, I have said that it was made the special order of the day for January 24th; that it was debated by the Senator from South Carolina on that day; that the Senate did not again sit until the 28th, when the debate was continued by myself. On the same day (the 28th) the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] informed the Senate that he had been requested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] to ask that the further consideration of the bill be postponed. The reason assigned was, that the Senator from Ohio desired to be heard upon it, but that he was called from the city by illness in his family. It appears, however, that a Senator from New Jersey, no longer a member of this body, [Mr. DAYTON,] obtained the floor, but did not continue the debate. Thus it was, that the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, which had been introduced at an early day of the session, and promptly and actively carried on through its various stages, lay in repose, after the 28th of January, for reasons which I am about to assign to the Senate.

The Senator from Mississippi says, according to his recollection or his construction, that there was a policy on the part of the gentlemen who had charge of the bill, in thus keeping it back. I think I have shown, that up to January 28th, whether there was a policy or not, the bill was not kept back, but was urged and pressed upon the consideration of the Senate. I have shown that on the next day (the 29th) the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky were introduced, and that the debate continued upon them, together with the motion to refer, up to the period to which I am about to advert. On the 13th of March, the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky and of the Senator from Tennessee, in connection with the motion to refer to a special committee, being still under debate, a Senator from Connecticut, no longer a member of this body, [Mr. BALDWIN,] moved that all matter in the resolutions relating to the State of California be excluded from that reference. I have no doubt that many Senators, who were present then, will recollect that there was a strong and prevailing inclination on the part of gentlemen opposed to the reference, to except certain favorite measures of theirs from it. This California bill was one of them. Upon the proposition to exclude it, a Senator from Massachusetts, no longer a member of this body, but at the head of the Department of State, expressed himself strongly in favor of keeping it separate. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] expressed himself favorable to the plan of reference, but said, "My hopes are not strong as to any favorable results to grow out of this committee. The chances have been much diminished by the vote taken on yesterday, if that vote contained any indication of the feeling in this Chamber with regard to the committee itself, and the benefit to result from it." The vote to which the Senator from Michigan had reference, was a vote taken the day before on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to take up the resolution, and his motion to refer, which proposition to take up was carried by a majority of two votes only, the vote being 24 yeas to 22 nays. From this the Senator drew an unfavorable augury as to any benefit to result from the committee proposed to be raised by the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Michigan went further, and said: "I am sorry to say that I can anticipate very little good from the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi. For myself, I am not prepared to say what my views will be upon this whole matter; they are not formed. I say merely, that this course holds out some hope, and is therefore well worthy of adoption." And he goes on to say: "We have been three months here, and what have we done? Nothing. We have not passed a single law of the least material importance. We have occupied the whole time by the discussion of this question, and no practical result has been attained; and present appearances do not indicate that such a result is near. But though we have done nothing, we have ascertained that some things cannot be done"—referring to the fact, that in his belief the Wilmot proviso and Missouri line could not pass.

As a part of the same debate he went on to say: "Well, then, Mr. President, if these things are impossible—if they cannot be done, it remains to inquire what it is in our power to do. My own opinion is, sir, that we should take up the bill for the recapture of fugitive slaves, reported by the Judiciary Committee. I am disposed to suspend

* all our discussion, and to lay aside all other business, with a view to act upon that bill," &c.

It was to this idea, thus thrown out in debate at that time, when the honorable Senator from Michigan expressed his apprehension, because of the vote taken the previous day, and for other reasons, that no good result was likely to follow from this committee, that it would be better to lay aside all the pending business of the Senate, and take up the fugitive slave bill, and act upon that alone,—it was to this stage of the proceedings that the Senator from Mississippi had reference, I presume, when he said that he had had a conversation with the Senator from Michigan, and other Senators, who had expressed a desire to have this law taken up; and that he consulted with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and myself, and we differed from him in opinion. I shall not discuss the question as to who was right and who was wrong in our decisions as to the expediency of carrying out the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan. I know I considered in my best judgment that I was right, and that he was wrong; and I acted accordingly. What was the state of things? The resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] I think some eight in number, were intended to cover the whole ground then agitated before this body. The seventh resolution had immediate reference to this fugitive slave bill. It is in these words:

"7th. Resolved, That more effectual provision ought to be made by law, according to the requirements of the Constitution, for the restitution and delivery of persons bound to service or labor in any State, who may escape into any other State or Territory of the Union."

The proposition of the Senator from Mississippi was to refer the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, and everything contained in them, to this special committee, which committee, by its deliberations on all the subjects thus connected, might be enabled to present such a series of measures as would tranquilize and quiet the public mind upon this entire subject.

The resolution to refer was in these words:

"Resolved, That the President's message and accompanying documents, on the subject of admitting California, be referred to a special committee of fifteen, (afterwards amended to thirteen,) to be chosen by ballot, whose duty it shall be to consider the same; and also to take into consideration the various propositions now before the Senate relating to the same subject, in connection with the subject of domestic slavery in all its various bearings; and to report, if they find it practicable to do so, a plan for the definitive settlement of the present unhappy controversy, and rescue from impending perils the sacred Union itself."

The resolution, then, was to refer the whole subject, embracing the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky and of the Senator from Tennessee, to this committee, for a great, practical, and wise end; requiring of the committee to report such a series of measures, embracing the whole subject committed, as would tranquilize the public mind, and make a final disposition of the subject committed. I went for it earnestly and zealously. There were some Senators from Southern States—one of whom, I more especially recollect, was the very illustrious Senator who then in part represented the State of South Carolina, and who is now no more, [Mr. Calhoun,]—who thought it would be better to defer raising that committee until the debate had ended. I differed from that distinguished Senator with great diffidence and great distrust of my own judgment; but I differed, and believed that it was our duty—a duty we owed to the subject and the country—to take the "chance," as expressed by the Senator from Michigan, of some good resulting from the deliberations of such committee. As the best evidence of the opinions of Senators representing slave States on the expediency of raising this committee, I advert to the fact that on the vote which startled the apprehension of the Senator from Michigan—the vote of 24 to 22 on taking up these resolutions—of the 24 yeas 17 were from the Southern States, and only 4 from the Southern States were in the minority of 22. I advert to this for the purpose of showing that those Senators who represented slave States, including, of course, those Senators who more immediately represented the fugitive slave bill, went for the committee, and in every instance voted for the reference. There were Senators who were against it altogether. A very distinguished Senator from Missouri, no longer a member of this body, (Mr. Benton,) was against it. Certain it is that he made strenuous efforts to except from its action the admission of California as a State into the Union. That exception was first moved by the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Missouri afterwards attempted it in the form of instructions to the committee, that they should not deliberate upon it. Further: the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] moved to except from the reference to the committee this very fugitive slave question. I have a memorandum of it in my notes, showing that on the 18th of April, he moved to except from the reference "such parts" of the resolutions "as related to the capture and return of fugitives from service or labor." The vote was taken by yeas and nays, and the proposition was rejected by 17 yeas to 27 nays. Amongst the 27 nays was one Senator alone representing a State holding the institution of slavery; that was the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton.)

I adduce these facts for the purpose of showing that it was the policy of those with whom I acted upon the fugitive slave bill, to let that subject go along with the rest to the committee. It was embraced in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, directly, by a separate and independent resolution. It was embraced in the proposed reference of the Senator from Mississippi, in comprehensive as well as in direct terms; and every attempt that was made to except any part of the general subject from that committee, was resisted by the almost combined vote of Senators from Southern States. I recollect perfectly—and doubtless other Senators recollect—that we considered it a matter of great moment that these questions should not be separated, if a committee was raised. I know, in reference particularly to the bill for the admission of California as a State, which I and some others looked upon as the most important in the whole batch, and against which our resistance was most sternly directed, every effort to exclude it from the committee failed by the vote of Southern Senators. And I would ask of the Senate, and of the Senators from Michigan and Mississippi, with what propriety, with what justice or reason—contending as we always had contended, that if that committee was raised, the whole subject should go to it—contending, as we had more especially done, that the question of the admission of California should go to it—could we have asked that this measure for the reclamation of fugitive slaves should be alone excluded? It would have destroyed the whole plan of operation, which, whether right or wrong, was that the whole subject before the Senate, affecting the institution of slavery in any manner, should be committed to that committee.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make one remark? I wish simply to state, that when I brought these facts to the attention of the Senate, upon which the Senator from Virginia has commented, my object only was to correct an impression that I feared might be made by certain remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] in reference to the position in which he intimated, or at least suspected, certain honorable Senators to be, in reference to the enactment of any law upon this subject. It will be recollected that he complained, in a special and emphatic manner, that there had been a very decided reluctance shown by Senators from the North to doing the South justice upon this subject; and that upon the spur of the moment, and certainly without the least deliberation or concert, I simply rose and vindicated those gentlemen by a statement of the facts which have been referred to by the honorable Senator from Virginia. My object only was to show here, and to the country, for obvious purposes, and with the view of quieting feeling that already, I thought, had been too much marked with extreme excitement upon this subject, that the Senators from the North—of course I allude chiefly to my political friends in this body—had manifested a disposition to do full justice to the South upon this subject. I stated the facts with a view of doing justice to honorable Senators whom I recollected distinctly authorized me to have the interviews alluded to early in the session, in regard to this question of slavery. I never said anything on the subject with the view of causing any one to misunderstand the position of the honorable Senator from Virginia, or the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in reference to this measure. I have always taken it that every member in this body from the Southern States must have felt the necessity of some legislation upon this subject, more efficient than that formerly adopted.

Mr. MASON. My only object is, as is sometimes said by my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] to take care of history—to have this matter correctly on record, and to vindicate, as far as may be necessary, myself and those with whom I acted, from any charge that we had been careless of our appropriate duties in reference to this fugitive slave law. It is thus seen that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi was designed to take the matter of this bill, together with its kindred subjects, from the Senate, and to carry them to a committee—a policy in which I fully concurred, and which was ultimately effected. One great and controlling purpose was, when that committee was raised, to except nothing from it, but let the whole subject go to it.

Thus it was, I apprehend, that the honorable Senator from Michigan, when, on the 13th of March, he proposed to take up the fugitive slave bill and act upon it separately, was, as he stated at the time, induced to do so because his hopes of raising the special committee had failed. He adverted to the close vote taken the day before, and declared his belief that no special committee could be raised; or, if raised, would result in no good. I take it for granted that the Senator from Mississippi thought differently; for he continued to press the committee, and eventually carried the measure. Whilst the motion to refer was before the Senate, we thought our original line of policy was the safest, and that the whole should be referred together.

Now, as to what particular views or opinions gentlemen held, or by what motives they were governed, either separately or collectively, I can, after so long a time, answer nothing. The record shows that we desired to except nothing from the deliberations of the committee.

Of the particular conversation referred to by the Senator from Mississippi, I have no recollection, though doubtless we had many. I do recollect that heretofore alluded to by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITCOMB,] But what my answer to him was I do not know, except that I declined the proposition he made, because we deemed it injudicious and inexpedient to press the bill at that time. I should hold so still. I think it highly probable that it was frequently said in conversation, that it would be impolitic in Southern Senators to do it, lest, among other reasons, they should weaken their position upon other vital questions affecting the institution of slavery, then before the Senate. The Senator from Mississippi says, that the reasons assigned for declining a change of our policy was, lest by so doing we might find it "impossible thereafter to rouse the border States to energetic action in coöperation with the other Southern States for the vindication of their essential rights." This may very probably have governed us to some extent in our desire to keep the subject together. I should have deemed myself wanting in my proper duty as a representative of one of the Southern States, if I had done anything which might tend to weaken the position which the Southern States then held. I trust I have thus shown to the Senate, and to the country, that so far as depended upon those to whom the fugitive slave law was more particularly committed, we were not only not wanting in our duty, but we did that which we deemed best for the occasion, and from which certainly no mischief has resulted, for the law ultimately passed in a most stringent form, without any very serious or decided opposition.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. It has ever afforded me the highest satisfaction on all occasions when the matter has been discussed, to state that I believe the whole body of Southern Senators had been perfectly faithful to the South on that subject, and that the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] and the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] acted not only with fidelity to the South in reference to this matter, but with great energy, judgment, and skill. That has been my opinion, and I have always expressed it. I would never have undertaken to intimate the fact which I have stated, that Northern Senators urged, through me, earlier action on this subject than took place, but for the fact that certain remarks which fell from the lips of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] if unreplicated, might leave the impression that Northern Senators generally had manifested most decided opposition to early legislation on this important subject. I rose simply for the purpose of stating the facts of the case, with the view of vindicating the secret truth of history which had not been previously revealed. My object was not to implicate the Senator from South Carolina or the Senator from Virginia, but simply to enable us to have a better understanding among ourselves, and to let my constituents, and the citizens of the South generally, understand that there was a strong and earnest desire on the part of influential Northern members of this body to accord to the South all that the South could claim on this point. That was my sole object.

Mr. MASON. I have finished what I had to say on this point, but I do not wish to take my seat without saying a few words upon the resolution now before the Senate. What I shall say must be brief, from reluctance to detain the Senate, as well as from my present condition, for I am unfortunately so hoarse that I can scarcely speak at all.

The resolution which is now before the Senate is of a character which does not, in any form, address itself to my approbation. I can see no reason for it, and no occasion for it. As I understand it, it declares that, in the opinion of this body, the measures cited should be considered as terminating all questions arising out of the institution of slavery. Now, I am not aware that there is any State in this Union, except the State of South Carolina, which continues to protest against them. I am not aware of one of the Southern States, except the State of South Carolina, which has not declared, in the most emphatic manner, to the majority in this Government, if you will stop there, and execute in good faith the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves, we will acquiesce in what has been done. That being the condition of the country, I can see no reason, no propriety, in further interference with the subject by the Congress of the United States. As to the measures themselves—the law for the admission of the State of California into the Union, the law for the abolition of what is called the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the law for the dismemberment of Texas—I have no change of opinion to announce, no palinode to sing. I opposed them upon this floor by my voice and by my votes; and when they passed, I united with other Senators in a solemn protest against them. I retract nothing of what I then said; my opinions of them remain unchanged. But they have passed to the statute-book; they constitute a part of the law of the land. I have never counseled, and never shall counsel, my people to further resistance on account of these laws. If they are allowed to remain as they are, and are efficiently executed, there is no purpose or desire on the part of the people of my State to disturb them, hardly and unjustly as we have, in our opinion, been dealt with by their enactment.

Such being the general feeling in those States most seriously affected by these measures, where is the necessity, where the propriety of disturbing again the subjects they disposed of? As to the fugitive slave law, I do not entirely agree with the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BURLEIGH] as to the practical effect of that law. I am not aware (unless it be in the first instance which occurred at Boston) of any instance where the officers of the Federal Government, in the execution of that law, have failed to do their duty. I am aware that, notwithstanding what I really believe to have been the fair and honest purpose of those officers to execute the law, in two States at least it has been effectually resisted. I refer to the cases in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, and Syracuse, New York. What was there done is now the subject of judicial investigation; and I am content to wait the result of that investigation, before I form an opinion whether it is or is not the intention of those States to have the law enforced.

So far the law has done good. It has awakened public attention to the necessity of having its provisions carried fully into execution. It has attracted around it the patriotic feeling of a large and intelligent portion of the people in those States. The subject is yet pending, and I am not prepared to pronounce a judgment upon the result. I trust that I am not hoping against hope when I say that I believe, in time, and in good time, the sentiment of the people of those States will be regenerate on this subject. They will find that it carries with it a portion of their constitutional duty; and they will find, also, that it carries with it the safety of the Union. It has been placed upon that distinct issue by almost all of the Southern States, and among others by the State of Virginia; and I do not despair of that law yet doing its office effectually.

Then as to this resolution further. I had understood from gentlemen who voted for those measures as a compromise, that they were to be received by the country as the great tranquilizing measure of peace—to end the discord and ill feeling which always attend the agitation of the subject of slavery in our deliberations. I object to this resolution, because it is not the usual and proper mode of legislative action. Our functions are to express the legislative will of the country through the forms of law and under the sanctions of law. The resolution on the table has no sanction—none whatever. It is inofficious, and, for whatever end introduced, its effect must be rather to renew agitation than to quiet it.

We are all aware that while these questions were pending the safety of this Union was most seriously endangered; but, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, I had hoped and believed that the bill which threatened us had passed under the ship. The public mind has become to some extent tranquilized. The people of the Southern States who felt themselves aggrieved by it, if not reconciled, are disposed to acquiesce; and in such condition of things, I submit, to what useful end should the subject be further agitated here? Sir, I did not sympathize in the slightest degree with what fell from the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RILEY,] who addressed us yesterday and the day before, when he declared himself for disunion. There is no State which made greater sacrifices to obtain this Union than the State which I have the honor in part to represent. She has made another great sacrifice to preserve it, by her acquiescence in the measures which are referred to in this resolution. The transactions of the past Congress, so far as they may affect the institution of slavery, are with her matters done with and ended. For what has passed, Virginia does not seek disunion. None can look with greater horror than do her people upon disunion for disunion's sake. But the Union which they cherish must continue a Union under the Constitution. A Union by force, or a Union in which the forms of the compact are alone regarded, whilst the rights of the minority are violated, her past history shows she will be the first to repudiate and to disown.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday, it would be exceedingly gratifying to me to obtain an early vote on this resolution. If I could be satisfied that the Senate would be now prepared to decide the question involved in the resolution, I should not hesitate to decline to address them, more especially as I feel that my present physical condition is such as to justify a desire on my part not to be compelled to go through the labors of the debate now in progress. I would say in addition, that if there are honorable Senators here who are anxious to be heard upon the question, and who do not design making any extended address to the Senate, I shall willingly give way. I mention this, because a friend suggested to me this morning that he should perhaps deem it desirable to be heard for a few minutes in explanation of the position of his own State in relation to this delicate question. I am willing to give way, or to take any course which honorable Senators may see fit to prescribe.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi is not prepared to proceed with his speech, which I know will take him some time to deliver, I have a few remarks to make, in consequence of an allusion made to my State by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RILEY.]

Mr. FOOTE. I shall give way to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, I design to make a statement, not a speech; for while I occupy a place here it is my intention to endeavor to make myself useful as a working man, rather than conspicuous as a speech-maker. The observations of the gentleman from South Carolina respecting the execution of the fugitive slave law in Pennsylvania, render it necessary for me to bring to the notice of the Senate the whole truth upon the subject. The gentleman stated, in a very denunciatory tone, that the fugitive slave law had not and would not be executed in any of the other Northern States; cited the Christiana riots in Pennsylvania, the recent trial in Philadelphia, and asserted that not a hair of the heads of the offenders would be harmed; and if they were convicted of offending against the laws, the Governor would pardon them. Now, sir, this statement does the State which I have the honor in part to represent, great injustice, and casts an imputation upon her, and the public authorities, which I feel bound to repel. It calls in question the fidelity of that State as a member of this Confederacy, in a manner entirely unauthorized by the facts; for there is not a State, old or new, more loyal to the Constitution and laws, or more devotedly attached to the Union.

Mr. President, I undertake to say to the Senate that the fugitive slave law has been executed, and will hereafter be faithfully executed in the good old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and that if any man is convicted of riot or any other offence in resisting it, the distinguished Democratic Governor elect (Colonel Bigler) will not grant a pardon, certainly not sooner than to any other offender. The single instance, or rather exception, to which the gentleman has referred, proves nothing against the other facts of the case. He might as well have cited any other case of riot in Pennsylvania, to prove that we cannot execute our own laws, and maintain the public peace. Is there anything in the recent trial in Philadelphia that goes to prove that the officers did not do their duty? Does any lawyer pretend to say that the distinguished judge (Grier) did not expound the law of treason correctly to the jury, and did not properly denounce abolition fanaticism? Would the honorable gentleman have charged the jury in any other way if he had occupied a place upon the bench? The zeal upon the part of the officers in Philadelphia faithfully to execute the law, led them, perhaps, to mistake the proper remedy and undertake too much. In connection with the Christiana case, another important fact should be stated, to wit: that in nearly every week since the passage of the fugitive slave law, fugitives from labor have been delivered up in Pennsylvania. The truth is, sir, that if a prejudice exists in Pennsylvania which could obstruct the due administration of justice, it is against the Abolitionists.

But, Mr. President, I have still stronger evidence to submit to the Senate in support of the position I assume, and that is the action of our State Legislature, and the result of the recent election in that State. The fugitive slave bill became a law in September, 1850. Shortly after that our Legislature assembled, and there being a large Democratic majority in the lower House, and a small one in the Senate, a bill was passed repealing the State laws which were in contravention of that provision of the Constitution relating to the surrender of fugitives from labor. The Whig Governor refused to sign the bill—the Legislature adjourned, and he kept it in his pocket. In a month thereafter the Democratic party assembled in convention, nominated a candidate for Governor, (Colonel Bigler,) passed resolutions in favor of the fugitive slave law, the compromise measures generally, and the repeal of all obstruction laws. The candidate accepted the nomination, and in the most emphatic manner pledged himself to carry out the views of his party, especially in relation to the fugitive slave law. The Whig convention met, and Governor Johnston made a speech before it, in which he talked about the right and duty of Congress to modify the law, and refused to say whether he would or would not sign the bill repealing the obstruction laws. Here are the resolutions adopted by the Democratic Convention:

Resolved, That the sixth section of the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed on the third of March, 1849, denying, under severe penalty, the use of our State jails for the detention of fugitive slaves while awaiting their trial, ought to be expunged from our statute-books, both because it interposes obstacles, by means of State legislation, to the execution of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and because it is a virtual disregard of the principles of the compromise, and is calculated seriously to endanger the existence of the Union.

Resolved, That the Democratic party of Pennsylvania are true to the Union, the Constitution, and the laws, and will faithfully observe and execute, so far as in them lies, all the measures of compromise adopted by the late Congress for the purpose of settling the question arising out of domestic slavery; and this not only from a sense of duty as good citizens of the Republic, but also from the kind and fraternal feelings which they cherish towards their brethren of the slaveholding States.

You will therefore perceive, Mr. President, that a distinct issue was thus made up, and an appeal was made to the virtuous, intelligent, and patriotic mind of the people, and their decisive result is well known. Shortly after both candidates were nominated I took occasion to declare my own position upon the question, and state my view of the issue to be decided, in a letter which I wrote to a Philadelphia committee, an extract from which I beg leave to read to the Senate.

"Political issues are to be determined this fall in our good old State, which justly occupies so important a position between the dividing interests of the North and the South, of the gravest character, in a State as well as a national aspect. I need not name them all. The true friends of the Union throughout the Confederacy look with anxious solicitude to the result. No State election was ever held so important in its national bearing. Pennsylvania is now to decide what she esteems to be her duty to her sister States upon the slavery question. She is now to decide how she construes the compact of Union. The Democratic party and its candidate frankly declare their purpose faithfully to execute the provisions of the Constitution, the fugitive slave law without complaint or modification, to repeal all obstruction laws, and to cherish fraternal feelings toward their southern brethren. Governor Johnston, the Whig nominee, (for whom personally I have the highest regard,) is pledged to a different policy; modification or repeal of the fugitive slave law, further agitation of the slavery question, and no repeal of the obstruction laws. Now, let us have an election which will decide something; for the safety of the Republic requires that there should be some end to the discussions about negroes and negro slavery. Let us see whether the National Whigs, as they call themselves, and the Abolitionists can unite in support of Governor Johnston. There has been heretofore too much paltering with grave and important questions prior to elections, and the result was witnessed in the fearful struggles of the last Congress, and can now be seen in the difference of opinion which exists between the Whig national and State administrations."

It seems to me, therefore, I have submitted sufficient evidence to the Senate to show that the fugitive slave law will be faithfully executed in Pennsylvania, and that one reason assigned by the Senator from South Carolina for desiring to withdraw from the Union has no foundation in fact.

While up, Mr. President, I beg leave to refer to another matter, in connection with this subject. It has been asserted that my honest, patriotic, and true-hearted predecessor, (Dr. Sturgeon,) who voted for the fugitive slave law, was not reelected on that account. Sir, that is not the fact. The people of Pennsylvania approved of that vote. If I had been here, I would have voted in the same way; and those who elected me very well knew it. My position in regard to the Wilmot proviso and Abolitionism was and is well known.

MR. RHET'G. In the observations which I made the other day, I was very far from desiring to cast any imputation upon the ancient Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I thought myself fully justified by the facts as they have occurred, to suppose that the fugitive slave law would not be there fully executed. I think my honorable friend from Pennsylvania has shown sufficient grounds himself, in what he has now submitted to the Senate, for the belief which I had intended to express. He has told us that the Governor of Pennsylvania refused to sign an act repealing the prohibitory laws which stood in the way of the execution of the fugitive slave law in Pennsylvania. He has told us further, that it became an issue in Pennsylvania; that the Democratic party took issue on that question, whether those laws should be executed or not. He tells us that the Democratic party have prevailed; but by what majority? Why, I believe by a majority of some six or eight thousand out of over three hundred thousand votes cast. The question was made a party issue, in which one half the people were arrayed against the other half. Under such circumstances, had I not good grounds to suppose that a law of this kind could not and would not be faithfully executed? One man on a jury may defeat the execution of a law.

Several things are yet to occur in Pennsylvania which may alter the impression which I have entertained. If the Legislature of Pennsylvania should again pass an act repealing those prohibitory laws, certainly it will be a strong indication on the part of that State that she is determined to carry out the fugitive slave law in good faith. Another requisite is, that all offenders who have resisted the execution of the law should be punished. That is yet to be shown. Although the honorable Senator—and I have no doubt he speaks with the utmost confidence in his opinion—says it will be enforced, it is yet to be seen that a single man can be punished in the free States for resistance to this law. There has not yet been one man punished for resisting it in any part of the North, although the frequent infractions of the law call loudly for punishment. The result of the Christiana trials must yet show whether these offenders can be punished. I should be very happy to know that Pennsylvania or any other State would do anything to accommodate the differences which now exist, by showing a disposition to be faithful toward the execution of laws. I have my doubts, however, and these doubts are based upon the facts which the Senator himself has laid before the Senate.

MR. BRODHEAD. It is true that the Democratic candidate for Governor had but about eight thousand majority, but the issue to which I have referred was not the only one to be tried before the people.

One word as to the Executive pardon, and the manner in which the fugitive slave law is to be executed. The gentleman has intimated that offenders against this law will not be punished. Why, if there is any prejudice in the State which would prevent the due administration of justice, it is against the Abolitionists, and not against the southern slaveholders. That is my answer.

MR. HALE. Mr. President, I did not intend to trespass upon the Senate during this discussion; and while it was confined entirely to another latitude, I did not feel disposed to interfere. But it seems to be peeping up this side of 36° 30', and therefore I may put in a single interrogatory. An inquiry has already been put and answered by the Senator from Mississippi, which throws some light upon the subject in regard to what my duty may be as to the vote I am called upon to give. That is the question which was propounded by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [MR. BUTLER] to the honorable Senator from Mississippi. It was laboring in my own mind at the time, and I felt relieved when the question came out and was answered. The question was this: If a proposition should be submitted to the Congress of the United States now to divide California by the line of 36° 30', would the embodiment of the compromise go in for it? The honorable Senator from Mississippi says he would go in for it. The compromise, then, is to be final, with exceptions.

MR. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I am reported in the Republic to have used precisely the language which the gentleman has attributed to me; but I was very particular in expressing myself to a somewhat different effect to that just now stated. I said most expressly, that I would vote upon such a proposition, coming from the State of California, precisely as I would upon a similar proposition coming from any other of the sovereign States of the Confederacy. I said that I did not conceive the compromise to be above the Constitution; and that, as the Constitution allowed new States to be formed out of old States, with the consent of those States, if such a proposition were submitted, with the consent of California, and if I should deem it politic and right to allow such division to take place, why I would deem it right, under present circumstances—especially knowing, as I do, the desire entertained by a large portion of my constituents—I would vote for the proposition, not with the intention of impairing the compromise, or calling into question the principle upon which the compromise is based, or in the least degree interfering with the compromise as a compromise. Every principle of it would still stand firm. All that we would do, would be to establish a new State, in the manner and form allowed by the Constitution. If the honorable Senator, or anybody else, considers the compromise above the Constitution, and, therefore, as liberating honorable Senators from the obligation which is imposed upon them by their oath to maintain the Constitution inviolate, it is not my sentiment. I did not say, here or elsewhere, that I shall attempt to obtain a modification of the compromise, so as to allow new States to be formed within the limits of California; but I said distinctly, that I would treat this proposition, coming from the State of California, precisely as I would treat a proposition of a similar kind coming from the State of Texas, or from New York, or from any other State; and that in doing so, I should not consider myself as interfering in the least degree with the compromise acts. On the contrary, I should look upon them, in the language of the President of the United States, as, in principle and substance, a final and definite settlement of the question.

MR. HALE. I am unfortunate in not seeing that the Senator has made any difference between the manner in which he has now stated the proposition, and the way in which I understood him to state it before. He says he holds it, as a compromise, to be final; but that a certain measure, if brought up in a certain shape, would receive his support. He would be willing to divide California if she wished it.

MR. FOOTE, of Mississippi. It must be obvious to the gentleman, that I should have considered the admission of California as part of the plan of compromise, just as valid, if the line of 35° 30' or 36° 30' had been made the southern boundary, instead of the present line. Will any man of sense will the Senator himself—undertake to point out to this Senate, how the compromise is better or worse, as a compromise, in consequence of a particular line being the southern boundary of California? Would it not be precisely a compromise, and a settlement of the question of slavery, whether the southern boundary of California were one line or another? If the people of California, as a sovereign State of the Union, should think proper to apply for a subdivision of their territory, in such manner as to establish new States therein hereafter, and they should come into the Union, upon the same terms upon which California came in, will any one undertake to point out in what respect the compromise, as a compromise, in principle or in substance, would be in the least degree impaired? I am not now engaged in a chop-logic contest; nor do I wish to amuse the audience by lightly discussing these great points; but what I have said will serve, in other minds, if not in the mind of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think, as a pretty solid distinction, and one based upon principles exceedingly valuable to those of us, at least, who seek the future repose of the country.

MR. HALE. My object simply was to obtain light, and I wish to put in a query now, before the Senator from Mississippi makes his argument. I want light, and I want to attract his attention to the points upon which I need enlightenment. I understand him now—stripped of all the eloquent adjectives with which he has dressed out his proposition, and which he uses as well as any man in the Senate—I understand him now, after these repeated disclaimers and explanations, to go back to precisely the same answer which he gave to the honorable Senator from South Carolina; that is, if the sovereign State of California, in her sovereignty, comes here to this representative conclave of sovereignties—(I am not a sovereign man, and hence I do not know that I always use this adjective in a proper way; I do not represent a sovereign State here; the State of New Hampshire has not a right to make war or peace; she has no right to coin money, or to send or receive ambassadors, and she is stripped of a great many other attributes of sovereignty)—but if California comes here as a sovereign State, and asks for a division, she will not lack the vote of the Senator from Mississippi in order to obtain it. That I understand to be the proposition.

I am not discussing the question whether it is proper or improper, or how far it is consistent with the views of those gentlemen who have supported the compromise. I simply want to ask Northern Senators what they got by this compromise? A compromise, I understand to be something in which there is a giving and a taking on each side. The honorable Senator from Mississippi said—and I think with a great deal of truth—that the South ought to be satisfied, for they had got everything which they had demanded. I believe it. I have been asked sometimes by some of my unsophisticated constituents at home, "What did the North get in this compromise?" Well, I have been compelled to tell them that it had escaped my recollection if they had got anything. It was said that the North had probably got something by the admission of California; that that great State had been admitted with a constitution excluding slavery. But some of my friends have said, Did not the people of California frame their own constitution, and is not that the Southern doctrine, that every State may frame its own constitution, and ask for admission into the Union,

That seems to me to be a Southern doctrine rather than anything peculiar to the North. All that the North got began, and continued, and ended with the admission of California.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I wish to correct the gentleman with regard to myself. What I meant was simply this, that, in my opinion, although we of the South were opposed to the admission of California at the time when she was admitted, I preferred that she should remain in a territorial condition for reasons satisfactory to us, but not at all based on the supposition of many of us, that her admission would be unconstitutional. Although we were not particularly anxious that the District of Columbia bill should be passed through Congress in the form in which it did pass, yet I have said that I am prepared to maintain it. The South, the unaggressive South; the South, that has never claimed anything except the enjoyment of her domestic rights; the South, that has stood firmly for the great principle of non-intervention and non-aggression; the South, that has only claimed the establishment of internal government, without any instructions on the subject of slavery;—that South, even in this compromise, has obtained, in my opinion, everything she claimed, which was simply a strict adherence on the part of Congress to the provisions of the Constitution. I did not say that the South, in a matter of bargain, had got the advantage of the North. I did not undertake to say that in a scheme of management the South had out-managed the North. I did not say that there were any essential advantages secured to the South by this plan of adjustment which the Constitution had not previously most amply secured. Nothing of the sort. But I did say, and have always maintained, that although we were opposed on grounds of expediency to the admission of California at the time that she was admitted, and opposed to it for reasons not, in my opinion, very important to the passage of the District of Columbia bill in the terms in which it did pass, yet that the plan of compromise, as a plan of compromise, was, in all its essential features, marked with the true spirit of moral equity, and, as such, ought to be and was satisfactory to the South, she never having claimed anything at the hands of her sister States of the North but simple justice, and a strict and faithful adherence to the Constitution.

Mr. HALE. I am confirmed again. The Senator did say that the South had got everything they claimed. Now, I did not say that the South had claimed anything which was unjust.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman certainly intimated that the South claimed something which the Constitution did not give her.

Mr. HALE. I do not know where the Senator from Mississippi saw the intimation. He might have felt it in the secret sanctuary of his own conscience, but he could not have seen it in anything which I said, for I did not say any such thing; I did not mean to intimate any such thing. But the Senator did say, and I think he said it with great truth, that the South had got everything which they claimed. When the historian of our land—and I do not know whether Bancroft has brought his book down to this period or not—but when our historian has written up to these times, the last chapter of our history from the foundation of the Government to the overthrow of the universe, it will be read that the South got everything they claimed. It has been so from the beginning; it is so now; and I have no doubt that it ever will be so. If the North were to speak the language of truth to the South, when we hear such reflections and taunts as we heard yesterday, our reply, however mortifying it might be, would be the language of Balaam's beast to him when he smote him: "Why hast thou beaten me these three times? Am I not thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine?" [A laugh.] That, sir, would be the truth of history.

I was proceeding to relate in my own way something which had passed between myself and my constituents when they had asked me what the North had got by this compromise. There was a question raised some years ago in the other House about what was called the "Wilmot proviso." I think the vote upon that question was nearly, if not quite, unanimous from the Northern States. I do not know that the vote was quite unanimous, but there were certainly very few exceptions. That vote, if ever there was a vote of the House of Representatives that did it, spoke out the sentiments of the North. That was the matter upon which issue was joined. There was no dispute then about any fugitive slave law; there was no dispute then about the admission of California; there was no dispute then about whether we should give Texas ten millions of dollars, and a hundred and fifty thousand square miles of land not to make war upon us. The sole and simple question which agitated the public mind, and divided the public councils, at that time, was the application of this Wilmot proviso to our Territories. That is settled, and what have the North got there? How much of this territory has been appropriated to them? Not one single inch. You had a northern majority here in the two Houses; you made the law for that territory; and as if you were not certain that slavery would watch its own interests carefully enough—as if you had doubts that that institution which had watched with sleepless eye the progress of this Government from its first institution to the present moment, and would not be quick to grasp every advantage that might possibly accrue to it—your Northern men invited the South to carry slavery there. It was not enough that you left it open, but you put in the bill a suggestion to them to take slavery there. You said to the South, "Take your slaves there, and it shall form no objection to your admission as a State at a future day—you may come in with or without slavery, as you choose." The South knew that before, just as well as they did after the passage of the act. It seemed to me that it was entirely unnecessary to put that into the bill by way of suggestion; but there it is. That is the way the question was disposed of. There was an entire and utter abandonment of principle in relation to every inch of the territory. California was admitted; the fugitive slave law was passed; and in the whole series of measures, I do not know of anything which passed in which the most brazen-faced man that ever stood up before an insulted constituency, could tell them there was anything favorable to the North, unless in the admission of California. I do not know of anything else. The law abolishing the slave trade in the District of Columbia was, if I understand it, exactly the law of Maryland. We just assimilated the law of the District to what the law of Maryland was. True, we got nothing. We did not get the shadow of anything, unless it was the admission of California. And now we are called upon to vote that this system of measures called the "Compromise," is to be final and conclusive in everything except that which had the shadow of something which was favorable to the North. That is to be left open for repeal.

The Senator says that he would not put the compromise above the Constitution. Well, would he put the compromise above the Constitution in any other respect except in the admission of California? The fugitive slave law is but an act of ordinary legislation. Is that law above the Constitution? And suppose that some sovereign State should come here in her sovereignty and ask that it should be repealed, is the question not to be opened? I understand this compromise perfectly, and I understand this resolution perfectly; and if they were put in the meaning which, in effect, they carry to the public mind, the resolution would read thus: "Resolved, That the South having got everything they claimed, they will be content until they want something more; and when they want something more, they will take it." [Laughter.] If they want California divided, they will have it divided. If that is not enough, if it is found that these institutions for which these champions are ever so zealous and of which they are so jealous—if they find that these emigrants who come in such fearful numbers, as was portrayed by the eloquent Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT] and fill up this territory and make free States, and it is found to be necessary for the protection and extension and perpetuation of human slavery that Cuba should be annexed, I wonder if the compromise would be regarded final as touching that? No, sir; not at all. Whenever they want any more slave territory, they will have it. Pass your compromises and cover them over with resolutions every session, they are only calculated to be binding for the present, until something further is wanted.

Mr. FOOTE. The resolution contains nothing against the acquisition of territory.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman suggests that there is nothing in the resolution against acquiring territory at a certain end of the Union.

Mr. FOOTE. Anywhere.

Mr. HALE. I threw these questions out that the Senator from Mississippi may see what is laboring in my mind, and why I cannot vote for the resolution with the light which I now have. But there is another subject which has addressed itself to my mind, which I want the sense of the Senate upon in some way or other before the session is over. I want to know if it is intended by this compromise, and by this resolution, to endorse the doctrines that have been promulgated in the judicial administration of this law? I want to know if the odious and infamous doctrine of constructive treason, which brought Charles the First to the block and which drove the second James a wanderer from the throne of his ancestors—I want to know if the doctrines of constructive treason, which have been broached in some instances by very high authority, are to be baptized in this senatorial font by this resolution of approbation which we are to pass? Sir, I think that here, if nowhere else, in the great council of the nation, the attention of men, of patriots, ought to be directed to this outrage which is perpetrated on the Constitution and laws of the land, and upon all the ideas of constitutional liberty which every man who is read in English or American history must have entertained since the Revolution of 1688. I want to know if the framers, the founders of the Constitution, when, with that foresight which belonged to them, acquainted as they were with the history of the country from which they came, they inserted this provision into the Constitution: that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort," imagined that it was to be overridden by this compromise, or its administration? I look upon it as one of the main dangers of the times, as one of the most alarming facts that the history of this country has developed, that the judiciary of the land have been so swift to prostrate and to prostitute themselves before the operation of this law, so as to override, and nullify, and destroy that great safeguard of constitutional liberty which the framers and founders of our Constitution thought they had secured. I hope that the honorable Senator from Mississippi will let us hear from him upon this subject.

I want to know if the fugitive slave law, which confessedly takes away the trial by jury from persons claimed as fugitives, also takes away the right of trial by jury from every one who may come in contact with the operation and administration of this law? I think this is a subject which has not yet attracted the attention which belongs to it. Evil precedents and evil examples always grow up in this way. In times of great excitement, when a very popular, or a very unpopular cause is before the country, men's minds become excited, and, in the madness of the moment, they resolve that which it seems they could not have resolved if their intellects had not been scathed by the Almighty. They utter something which in after times is seized upon as a precedent, and works the most dangerous consequences to the interests of the country. I hope that before this subject is finally disposed of, this matter will attract and receive attention.

I trust it is not necessary for the preservation and conservation of any institution in the land, that that great principle of constitutional liberty which has been ingrafted upon the Constitution by its founders, and which they learned by the bloody history of the Revolution the necessity of inserting, shall not be overridden by any attempts to give peculiar force to the administration of the fugitive slave law.

I wish to throw out another subject, on which I trust the Senator from Mississippi will speak, for it was alluded to by the honorable Senator from South Carolina. When I have spoken upon this subject, I have been in the habit of speaking plainly. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT] when speaking of the great difficulties which embarrassed the South in this matter, said, in effect, that the majority of the judges who had been sent by the Administration into the newly-organized Territories of Utah and New Mexico, were supposed to be those who would give a judicial construction to the law, unfavorable to what he thought was the constitutional law of these Territories. I do not now know what the facts of the case are, but I do know this; that whatever may be the character of the territorial judges, there is a tribunal that sits beneath this Senate chamber, which is the very citadel of American slavery, and that it will be perfectly safe here; whatever the territorial judges may say. I know that although a very large majority of the people of these Territories may come from the free States, yet the sleepless and watchful guardians of that peculiar interest have retained, and will retain, in the organization of that court, a majority of members who form their local.

Mr. STOCKTON. I am altogether unacquainted with the rules which govern the order of the Senate; I do not, therefore, know exactly what course to take except this—to say that, as an American citizen and a Senator, I cannot sit here and hear such language in reference to the Supreme Court of the United States, without doing something to arrest this course of debate. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey calls the Senator from New Hampshire to order. The Chair does not think himself at liberty to decide that the Senator from New Hampshire is out of order, inasmuch as his remarks do not apply either to this body or to the other House, the rules particularly protecting the other House against any improper allusion on the part of members of the Senate. It is for the Senator himself to determine how far it is proper for a member of this branch of the Government to hold up either to ridicule or denunciation, another coordinate branch of the Government. It must rest with himself.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator from New Jersey misunderstood the application of one remark that I made, and that was, in reference to the prostration and prostitution of certain influences. This remark did not apply to the Supreme Court of the United States, because no case growing out of the fugitive slave law ever came before them. I confess that I had supposed it was but a legitimate range of debate to comment upon the proceedings of other branches of Government; and I thought I had authority for it, from remarks which have been thrown out this session, in commenting on some of the duties of the President of the United States. I supposed that the President of the United States was a coordinate branch of the Government, as much as the Judiciary; but remarks reflecting on the conduct of the President of the United States have been indulged in at this session. If my reading is right, there has heretofore been a good deal of latitude allowed in debate, not only in speaking against acts, but in impeaching and impugning his motives. I have only said that the constitution of the Supreme Court of the United States was composed of a majority of men who, from their local position, are supposed peculiarly to represent this interest, and that the advocates of slavery would always find a safe citadel there. They may be driven from the Senate, but it will be a great while before that comes to pass; for these twenty-eight States will not come in so fast as the Senator from South Carolina fancies. I have found that it is always States that are called free that, when they get into Congress, and go to voting, are found voting on the side of what the Senator from South Carolina would denominate the fanatics. They are sometimes very conservative in their views; and there is a great deal of truth in the remark which the Senator from South Carolina made yesterday, that the North were South in the House some time ago on this subject; that is, the North sustained slavery in its demands; but he said the South were not true to themselves. What was the reason? Why, it was because Northern servility outran Southern arrogance. That is the reason. They saw Northern men ruining themselves at home among their constituents by the depth to which they yielded, and therefore it was that some from the South gave way and said, they would not slaughter their friends at home by asking them to sacrifice themselves for them. That is the reason the South did not get all that some Southern men desired.

Some of those Northern men found what General Scott found when he was ordered to Mexico. They found a fire in the rear, and they began to find that the fire in the rear was hotter than the fire in front; therefore it was that there was a change brought about on the floor of the House of Representatives in regard to the subject of slavery. I say, and I repeat, with all the respect which is due to the Supreme Court—and I am not going to say how much that is—reading the reports of their decisions whenever that institution has come before them; the most jealous friend of slavery could not fail to have his fears quieted as he read in the Book of the Chronicles the doings of that tribunal in regard to the institution which is the subject of his affections. No, sir; all the proceedings of those territorial judges, be they what they may, must come for ultimate supervision and correction before this tribunal of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have not, as I said, been making a speech. I have been putting forth matters by way of interrogatory, for the purpose of opening that reservoir of information and instruction which will soon pour its learning upon the Senate, in the hope that the darkness under which I am laboring—the cloud which obstructs my vision—may be illuminated. I confess that there is another dark speck in the horizon. It seems to me that these compromise measures have not had that quieting effect upon the nerves of gentlemen which their friends anticipated. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] to whom I listened with a great deal of pleasure and some instruction, did not seem to be quieted. If the honorable Senator from Mississippi is not going to bag his game, and go home in a hurry, I may hope to reply to that speech at some future day. The honorable Senator from South Carolina says the condition of the South is infinitely worse than it was before these compromise measures were passed. He says that before their passage there was a comparative state of quiet, not perfect, for nothing can be perfect in this world, but there was a comparative state of quiet until these "distinguished men of the Senate" came with their soothing palliatives and healing plasters to cover up these bleeding wounds, but that since they have, the case has been infinitely worse. Well, the Senator from Mississippi seems now to think the disease must be treated on the homeopathic principle, and that, as these compromise measures in several acts have produced such a state of irritation in the patients, a small dose by way of resolution, will certainly cure the disease. I do not believe it. I believe, with great deference to the better judgment of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that the introduction of this very measure—of this very resolution, has not been healing, quieting, and soothing. I know it is out of order to make personal allusions, but I think the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] mentioned in his speech that it had not had that effect on him, but that it rather opened old wounds which he had hoped the healing influences of time might have cured.

Mr. FOOTE. Has it had a soothing influence on the Senator?

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator makes a personal appeal to me; he wants to know if it has had such an effect upon me. I confess that it has not; nor did the original dose in the first instance. I thought it ill-judged and ill-advised, and I think so now. I think it was the greatest misnomer that ever was known to call it a compromise. I think the honorable Senator from Mississippi has very rightly named it when he says that the South got all she claimed; but he adds that she did not claim anything but what was right. I remember hearing a controversy about the freedom of conscience in old times between a Quaker and a Presbyterian. The Presbyterian told the Quaker, "You have liberty of conscience; you have liberty to believe what is right, and nobody should have liberty to believe what is wrong." The honorable Senator says the South got all she claimed; but he consoles us and applies a palliative to our irritated feelings by telling us that she only claimed what was right. I thought that we of the North claimed nothing but what was right. We claimed that the Government should go on in its old course. We claimed that that system of legislation, older than the Constitution itself, sanctioned by Washington, and by all our Presidents, from Washington to James K. Polk, affirming and determining the right of legislation over slavery in the Territories, should be adhered to. We asked that there should be no new lights set up for us to follow. We asked that we might go on as in the old days of the Republic—that we might walk in the footsteps which Washington himself had planted, and guide our way by the light which his successors had shed upon the path of duty. That was all we asked, and we humbly thought we were asking nothing but what was right; but the Senator from Mississippi comes and asks us to reverse our steps—to retrace our progress, and nullify and stultify the legislation which has marked the history of the country from the adoption of the Constitution, and before the adoption of the Constitution, to the signing of the Oregon bill, and give slavery free liberty to enter upon all the Territories. The honorable Senator asked us to do that, and we did it; and then he says we did no great things after all, because he only asked us to do what was right. When he asked us to give up a principle which had been consecrated by the continued practice of the Republic from its first days to that moment, he asked us not only to say that there should be no legislation against slavery, but that we should invite slavery to go to the Territories. Now he says it was right, and we did well.

Sir, I should like to see a spirit of candor, and Northern men and Southern men sit down and candidly talk over the compromise, and count up their winnings and losings. What have the North given up? Why, when a citizen of the free States, black or white, is claimed as a fugitive from labor, all that a Northern man has ever held sacred in the institutions of human government, he has to surrender. He has the trial by jury, and the habeas corpus, and the right of personal replevin—all are to be thrown into the scale, and surrendered at once. And is that all? No, sir. He is called upon, after he has done all this—after he has yielded to the last inch, every claim, and every demand that are made upon him, and it is said that he cannot have the reputation of being an honest citizen unless he is ready once in twelve months to reindorse the act, and to swear to the compromise.

I am afraid that if we magnify this compromise much more, it will come, by and by, in the political creed, to usurp the place of the famous resolutions of '98; and that instead of their being a standard and measure of a man's orthodoxy, it will be this compromise. I thought it was ill-timed in the beginning—I thought it was ill-timed to call it up now to have it rechristened. It seems to me to be an impeachment of the orthodoxy of those who passed the act. Sometimes we know that when a man is converted from one sect to another pretty rigid one, although his children may have been baptized in the form of his old faith, they have to be rechristened in the new. It seems to me that that is the attempt which is made now. It is an impeachment of the orthodoxy of those who passed the act, and as if it gave a force and validity which the original act did not. Therefore it is, perhaps, that we, in our wisdom and strength, are to reindorse and rebaptize it, and tell the good people of the United States that this fugitive slave law in particular is a good one. If this resolution is to be adopted (although I have been accused sometimes of offering amendments with sinister views to defeat the original resolution) I shall question whether it is not my duty, as a member of this Congress, to add some other acts to it, and to include in the resolution other measures which the last Congress in their wisdom enacted, which are good, and ought to be observed and carried out, until some sovereignty wants it altered, for it seems to me that that is all the limitation which the Senator would impose.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I simply rise to say that I am desirous of having an opportunity of vindicating this poor resolution of mine against the opposition of extremists in the opposite sections of the Union. I had expected to see this happy harmony between gentlemen of extreme opinions North and South; I had expected them to feel that sweet concert of action and sentiment here, and my anticipation has been fully realized. But I am exceedingly anxious, feeble as I am, and inadequate as I am to the performance of the task, to have an opportunity of meeting these extremists of the North and extremists of the South upon this subject. I am anxious to have an opportunity of showing to the whole country that this resolution has been wholly misunderstood in its character and bearing, and that it is calculated to have a very different effect from that which the honorable gentleman who has just taken his seat thinks it likely to produce.

Certainly it is not at all astonishing that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] and the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] should be opposed to this resolution. It would have surprised me exceedingly if either of them had been in favor of it, because all must understand that the resolution is not calculated to produce additional agitation or to disquiet the public mind. It seems to be strongly censured by gentlemen not very remarkable, they will permit me to say, for the manifestation of a proper willingness to allow the public mind North and South to remain in a state of quiet and composure. The opposition of these gentlemen is the best recommendation to the resolution, and will serve to show to all that the resolution is such a one as should be adopted by the Senate.

I did not rise at the present time for the purpose of replying to the remarks of these gentlemen, but simply for the purpose of suggesting to the Senate the claim which I feel that I have upon their indulgence, to allow me an opportunity to reply to the Senators from New Hampshire and South Carolina to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. I feel it to be but an act of justice to the judiciary to say something in relation to the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. I participated in the same feelings which actuated my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] when he rose to the point of order. What does the Senator from New Hampshire mean, when he says that so long as the Supreme Court of the United States is organized as it is, we must expect the influence of the judges in favor of slavery? Is it his object to say that that Court should be constituted differently from what it is constituted under the Constitution of the United States? Is it its organization, as a judicial tribunal, that he objects? What does he mean?

Mr. HALE. What I meant to say was this: That the division of the United States into judicial circuits, is such as to give a majority of judges upon the Supreme Bench to those localities in which the institution of slavery is sustained.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the Senator undertakes to say that the judges who come from the southern portion of the United States are not honest? for it amounts to that. As far as I can speak of the opinions of the Supreme Court, I can say that I have discovered nothing of the tendency attributed in the decisions of the judges from one portion of the Union to the other. In the case of Prigg and the State of Pennsylvania, the judgment was, I believe, pronounced by a Southern judge, and I believe it has been generally understood to be one of the most unfortunate decisions, in its effects upon the South, of any that has ever been made by that bench. I believe that Judge Wayne was authorized to draw that opinion.

Mr. SUMNER. Judge Story delivered that opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. I am informed that Judge Story delivered the opinion in that case, but Judge Wayne certainly concurred in it. The judges were not divided in their decision by any geographical line.

Since the gentleman has been so bold in his expressions, I defy him, in the face of this Senate, to produce a single case in which the Supreme Court has deliberated on any matter affecting the institution of slavery in accordance with the sections of country from which they came. The gentleman has made a bold assertion, which he cannot sustain. The strongest opinion ever given on the Supreme bench, in relation to this subject, was in the case of Prigg vs. the State of Pennsylvania, in which Judge Wayne, the extreme Southern judge, gave a separate decision, concurring with Judge Story. Has it come to this, that because judges in the original organization of the Supreme Court under the Constitution, and at a time when honest men were disposed to preserve and observe it—were sworn to observe the Constitution and the laws of the land—they can have it imputed to them that, if they come from one section of the Union, they are less likely to be honest than those who come from another? If the gentleman intends to have a reorganization of this Court, I presume he wants to have it in such a way as to give a preponderance to the Northern section.

If you will select a lawyer from any section of the United States, and place him upon that bench, if he is an honest man, I would as soon trust him if he came from the North as if he came from the South. I am not one of those who believe that a judge can act under the temptations of a demagogue. Placed on that bench—elevated above the ordinary excitements which too much influence political controversies, they have nothing to do but to appeal to the Constitution, and be governed by their consciences in the administration of justice. I will not, as a Southern man, allow myself to suppose that any of the considerations imputed to Southern judges would influence Northern judges while in the discharge of the high duties devolved upon them. I will not make such an imputation upon the judges of the North. It is a casuistry of morality which will allow gentlemen to make such charges to pollute the public mind. I would rather have heard of any other department of this Government being assailed, because the other departments may have their representatives and advocates on this floor. The President has his advocates here. The different political parties have their advocates. The Judges of the Supreme Court have to take the aspersions of everybody who may think proper to make political capital by attacking them. I am a very unworthy person to speak for them on this occasion, and I do solemnly declare, so far as regards their opinions on the subject of slavery, in looking through them, I have not been able to discover anything like a bias, North or South.

Mr. HALE. One fact cannot have escaped the attention of anybody who has been in the Senate for the last few years, because it is a fact to which attention has been called. There was a great constitutional question of law, upon which there was difficulty. I allude to the question whether slavery was or was not abolished in the territories acquired from Mexico by the operation of the Mexican laws. It was remarked as a very astonishing fact upon the floor of the Senate, that every Senator who spoke on that subject, living south of a certain geographical line, took one view of the constitutional question, and those living north of that geographical line, took a contrary view.

Mr. WALKER, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and others. It is not so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is contrary to the fact.

Mr. HALE. I say that the fact was so stated upon the floor of the Senate. Such is my recollection. There may have been some exceptions, and gentlemen will remember them if there were. The general fact was, that lawyers on one side of the line pronounced that the question of constitutional law ought to be one way; and lawyers on the other side of the line pronounced that it ought to be the other way. If there were individual exceptions, they have escaped my recollection. This fact was alluded to in a speech delivered to the Senate by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CHASE.] It is no impeachment of a man's integrity—whatsoever the Senator from South Carolina may consider it—to say that a man's opinions are influenced, bent, and biased, by the circumstances in which he may be placed—by the localities and influences amid which he may be educated. It is to say nothing more than to say that man is human. That is the fact, and the history of the country will show it; and we are not so blind as to shut our eyes to an existing fact, because we think the fact is not consistent with the highest degree of purity in mankind. Such is the fact; it always has been, and always will be so until human nature is regenerated.

What did I say about the Supreme Court? I said, and I repeat, that I believe it is the citadel in which this institution of slavery has been protected, and will be protected; and I say that the constitution of that court—not its constitutional organization, for the circuits are organized by act of Congress—I say that these judicial districts or circuits, are so organized that a majority of the judges upon the Supreme Bench are from those parts of the country in which the institution of slavery is upheld. The Senator from Ohio alluded to this in a speech which he delivered to the Senate some time ago, and in that speech demonstrated, by reference to the history of the country, that it had always been so. If it has not always been so, and if Southern gentlemen have had such high confidence in Northern lawyers, I wonder it has not manifested itself in the legislation of the country.

Mr. CASS. Does the honorable Senator mean to intimate, that the four judges from the non-slaveholding States have uniformly gone against the five judges from the slaveholding States, in reference to this question?

Mr. HALE. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. CASS. Then it was not owing to the division of the districts.

Mr. HALE. I did not mean any such thing. The honorable Senator from South Carolina alluded to that; and he says that you cannot find a case in which the judges were divided in their opinions by geographical lines. Well, can the Senator from South Carolina find a case where Senators upon this floor have divided according to geographical lines? Can he find it in the other House? But to return to the point. If these gentlemen have such high confidence in the integrity of Northern lawyers, why has it happened that they have never trusted a majority of Northern lawyers on that bench? If they have had such confidence in the learning and the integrity of Northern lawyers, why, in the name of God, has it not manifested itself in the legislation of the country? No, sir. The territory covered by the free States is vastly larger, and their population and business is vastly larger than that of the slave States; yet this interest has always been careful; or, if it has not always been careful, it has always accidentally secured a majority of Southern gentlemen upon that tribunal, from the beginning of the Government down to the present time. It would be time enough to talk of having confidence in the integrity of Northern lawyers, when you shall have shown yourselves willing to trust a majority of them to try those cases. You never have trusted them, and, my word for it, the day is far distant when this confidence will be manifested in the organization of this court.

I know that I am speaking in a Senate full of lawyers. I believe that more than nine tenths of the body are lawyers. I know what the feelings of lawyers are in regard to judges. I know that respect for courts is a part of their very nature; and I suppose that I have as much of that in my constitution as most men. But with all of it I say, and I repeat it, I appeal to the country to bear me witness, I will make the issue before the world, I will stake what little reputation attaches to so humble a name as my own upon the assertion, that upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States rest the final hopes of the institution of slavery. I have said this without impeaching their integrity. I have said nothing about their integrity; and the remark which the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] attributed to me, about some judges prostrating and prostituting themselves before the influence of this institution, did not apply to the judges of the Supreme Court, but elsewhere, because there have been no cases under this law before that court. I stand to the general truth of the remark which I have made. I believe what I have said, that it has been constituted with that object in view, with the hope that the anchor of slavery might there rest in a sure place. A majority of that court have been selected for their local positions. In saying this I do not mean to say that a man coming from a certain latitude is a dishonest man. No such thing. I have said nothing from which that can be intimated. What I have said I repeat, that the judges of the Supreme Court are nothing but men. I think I have seen as good specimens elsewhere. Being nothing but men, from the necessity of their moral and intellectual constitution, it must be that they are influenced, more or less, by the institutions and influences of the places from which they come. This is what I have said, and this is what I stand by.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to correct the Senator from New Hampshire in one particular. He has fallen into a great mistake, when he says that the Senators south of Mason and Dixon's line thought alike upon the particular subject to which he alluded. In reference to the continuation in full force of the laws of Mexico, I expressed the opinion, upon the floor of the Senate, that they did so continue, in response to a question put to me by the late Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON,] some years since. I have entertained that opinion from that day to this, and have avowed it on all suitable occasions. After the compromise bill was reported by the Committee of Thirteen, I contended that that provision which prohibited the local Legislatures from passing any law in respect to slavery within these territories, amounted, on that account, to the Wilmot proviso, and was anxious that it should be stricken out on that account. I go further. If I am not mistaken, my colleague, [Mr. CLAY,] who was in a very great degree the author of these compromise measures, entertained and expressed the same opinions which I myself have entertained on this subject. So that we at least constitute exceptions to the gentleman's remarks.

The Senator from New Hampshire seems to have forgotten that in the organization of the Supreme Court and districts over which the judges are to preside, that that took place many years ago, before this agitation on the subject of slavery occurred. If he will reflect a moment he will see that he is mistaken in another particular. There is much more territory east of the Mississippi, within the limits of the slave States, than there is within the limits of the free States; and in the organization of these judicial districts, originally, some respect was paid to territory as well as to population. On that account the legislation of Congress, in forming the judicial districts, necessarily produced the organization of the court as it is.

The Senator is mistaken in supposing that at the time these judicial districts were formed, the free States had a greater extent of territory than the slave States. The fact is entirely the reverse. So that you can account for the existing state of things without supposing that there were any sinister motives in Congress, in the organization of the Supreme Court, which I think the gentleman has attributed to the two branches of Congress. He should also recollect that during this whole time there has been a majority of the free States in both Houses of Congress. It was Congress that regulated these districts, and they regulated them upon the basis of territory and population.

I ask you, Mr. President, and I ask the Senate, if it be right to make imputations against the judges of the Supreme Court, or to make remarks from which inferences can be drawn unfavorable to their purity—from which inferences may be drawn stigmatizing them as corrupt men, without specifying the particular act? When the gentleman makes remarks of this sort, let him point out the particular decision—the ruling of a particular point, which he may be disposed to denominate corrupt or incorrect, before we can take issue with him. It is a very easy matter to deal in general declamation, and to say that a body of men may be unworthy of trust—that they may be corrupt. Why, you cannot take issue upon a general declaration of that sort, except by an unqualified denial.

The gentleman chooses to impeach the proceedings of the Supreme Court. Let him point to a decision; let him bring evidence, either of imbecility or corruption, and then we can see the ground upon which the charge is made. So far as my observation of the proceedings of that court has gone; so far as I have read the decisions of that court on questions connected with the institution of slavery, they have done nothing more than carry out the Constitution and laws of the country; and if they had not carried out that Constitution and those laws, they would have been corrupt. They are bound by an oath to support the Constitution and the laws, and their administration of those laws, in accordance with the Constitution, is the very best evidence of their purity.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I believe that the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] wishes to make a few remarks on this precise point. I shall be pleased to hear him, but he is not now here. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GOVERNOR KOSSUTH.

Mr. CARTTER asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution proposing the appointment of a committee of five by the Chair to wait upon Louis Kossuth on his arrival in Washington, and introduce him to the House of Representatives.

Mr. C. said the resolution was the same as that passed on the part of the Senate.

Objection was made by several, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the regular order of business.

Mr. FICKLIN. If I can get the ear of the House, I desire to make a single suggestion. It is, that by general consent we now proceed to call the States for resolutions, in order to give gentlemen an opportunity to introduce their resolutions and bills.

WORKMEN ON THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion pending on the adjournment yesterday, that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the view to consider the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH,] for the continuance of the work on the Capitol.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the House refused to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Calls for the regular order.

The SPEAKER said that petitions were in order from the State of Maine.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would respectfully submit that there have been a great many attempts made by gentlemen to introduce resolutions and bills. I hope, by general consent, we will have a call of the States for resolutions and bills.

Mr. FICKLIN. Let us have the general consent to the call for resolutions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

The House then proceeded to the regular order of business, which was the call of the States for petitions.

Mr. KING, of Rhode Island, presented the petition of Lewis E. Simmons, Captain in the United States Navy, praying to be reimbursed for the expenses of certain suits to which he has been subjected in consequence of the discharge of his duty; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, presented the memorial of Norman Sherwood, of Southport, Connecticut, praying for relief in relation to Mexican indemnity; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. KING, of New York, said he had no petitions, and asked the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution, which he hoped might be read for information.

Mr. CLINGMAN objected.

Mr. HAVEN presented the petition of John O. Hodge, of Cleveland, Ohio, now a pensioner at the rate of $96 per year, for an increase of pension, in consequence of disabilities received in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

On motion by Mr. BOWNE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Joshua P. Powers be taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOWNE also presented the petition of the assistant marshals of the county of Kings, and southern district of the State of New York, for increased compensation for their services in taking the Seventh Census; which was appropriately referred.

Mr. BURROWS presented the petition of Captain Hugh N. Page and other officers of the Navy, asking Congress to make provision for their relief similar to that made for the United States army serving in California and Oregon; also, the petition of petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States Navy, who served in the frigate Savannah, on the coast of California, praying for compensation similar to that granted by Congress to the army serving in California and Oregon; which were severally referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. B. also presented the petition of Phebe Thompson, widow of John Thompson, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the memorial of merchants and others of the city of Philadelphia, asking for the erection of piers and the construction of a harbor in the Delaware river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. JOHN W. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Lynch be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. KUHN, it was Ordered, That the papers of James Johnson be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HAMMOND, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Samuel T. Anderson, of the city of Baltimore, be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCKOCK presented the petition and papers of Daniel Guenant for a pension, in consideration of injuries received while in the service of the United States during the war with Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. CLINGMAN gave notice of his intention to move to repeal so much of the standing rules of the House as provides for calling the States for petitions.

Mr. AIKEN presented the memorial of Ann Y. Kelly, of Charleston, South Carolina, praying for an examination of the proceedings of the Board of Claims against Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, presented the petition of James M. Smyth; also, of A. H. Shepherd, for indemnity for loss sustained from hostile Creek Indians in 1836; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Moses Matthews, praying for indemnity for property destroyed by the enemy during the war of the Revolution, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of William O. Handley, grandson of Major George Handley, of the Georgia line of the Continental Army, praying for commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, presented the petition of the register and receiver of the land office at Monroe, Louisiana, for compensation for locating military land warrants and Choctaw scrip; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. M. also asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, for the removal of the Red river raft.

Mr. McMULLIN objected.

Mr. GIDDINGS wished to say to the House that the presentation of petitions in this manner was a waste of time. Gentlemen were at liberty to send in their petitions indorsed at any time under the rules. He moved that we dispense with the further call for petitions, and that the House do now proceed to the next order of the day.

Mr. JONES said that motion was not in order.

Mr. GIDDINGS then asked unanimous consent. Objection was made.

Mr. EDGERTON presented the petition of Abner Merrill for an invalid pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. E. also gave notice that he would on tomorrow, or some subsequent day, introduce a bill for the survey of the townships of Pulaski, Centre, and St. Joseph's, in Williams county, Ohio, being townships six north, and ranges one, two, and three east of the principal meridian.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given. He asked that it might be read for information.

Mr. FICKLIN said, that he would be glad to accommodate the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] but objection had been made to all other attempts to introduce bills. He therefore objected to this.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of Charles C. Lacy and J. F. Jones, late assistant marshals in the State of Kentucky, asking for compensation for taking the census; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a resolution of a public meeting of the citizens of the town of Westfield, county of Hamilton, and State of Indiana, recommending that no more public lands be sold, and that Congress provide for the free grant of the public lands, in small parcels, to the landless citizens of the several States and Territories. He asked that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of Hiram Duncan and 52 others, of the counties of Hancock and Hamilton, State of Indiana, praying that the offices of chaplain in the Army and Navy and Congress might be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BISSELL presented the petition of Jacob Shy, praying for a back pension; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. B. also asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill; which was objected to.

Mr. FICKLIN presented the petition of James M. Davis and others, late registers and receivers of the land office at Vandalia, Illinois, asking compensation for the location of bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, presented the memorial of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe for losses by Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. C. also asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for the improvement of Rock Island and the Des Moines Rapids, in the Mississippi river.

Mr. EVANS objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL also presented the memorial of John Frink, praying for relief; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given.

Mr. J. said, if objections were continually made to the introduction of bills, he wished to know when members were ever to have the opportunity of introducing them, and having them referred to the appropriate committees?

Mr. EVANS objected to its introduction.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That Henry Chapman and William Woodbridge have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers from the files of the House, that they may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate.

Mr. CONGER presented the memorial of C. Roosevelt and others, late and present registers and receivers of the land office of Genesee, Michigan, asking compensation for locating military land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. C. also presented the joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan in favor of a canal around the Falls of St. Marie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. C. also gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of the St. Marie river, at the foot of Lake Superior. Also of a bill to grant certain public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid that State in the construction of the Clinton and Kalamazoo canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EASTMAN presented the petition of Cornelius Ziehl, for back pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. SIBLEY gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to grant to the several States of the Union the proceeds of certain public lands, for the relief and support of the indigent insane therein.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN said the people of New Mexico had been urged to set up an independent government for themselves, and they had been promised the sustenance of several of the States of this Union. He hoped, under these circumstances, it would be the pleasure of this House to grant the people their light to impart to them knowledge of the affairs of the Government. He asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to cause, as soon as practicable, to be translated into the Spanish language the President's message and reports of heads of Departments, and to have printed in said language five thousand copies of the same, for distribution among the Mexicans, in the territory acquired by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Mr. FICKLIN objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD presented a memorial from the merchants and other business-men of Galveston, Texas, praying for a reconnaissance of the coast of Texas, and for the construction of a light-house, navy-yard, and fortifications; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the standing committees for reports.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Thomas Barclay Livingston, consul for the United States at Halifax, Nova Scotia, for increased compensation, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

On motion by Mr. H., it was Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Pierce Crosby and William E. Buckner, officers in the Navy of the United States, praying to be paid their respective shares of the award of the sale of the schooner Oregon, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HALL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the [subject not heard,] and it was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. CABELL, of Florida, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Abigail Connell, of New Hampshire, for a navy pension; and it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

On motion by Mr. BOCOCK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Josiah P. Pilcher, a volunteer, asking for certain pay, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

It was so referred.

RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to call the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Maine.

Mr. FULLER presented the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be and they are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the provisions of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1847, chapter 45, as deprives seamen, who may libel a vessel for the recovery of wages, from recovering full costs, and to report by bill or otherwise.

NEWSPAPERS TO MEMBERS.

Mr. FULLER submitted a resolution providing for four daily papers to the members of the present and future Congresses.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that the rules prescribe that no member shall offer more than one resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule of the House.

Mr. FULLER. That is in regard to resolutions on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order without the general consent of the House—the resolution being a distinct one in a distinct form.

Mr. FULLER withdrew the resolution.

Mr. GOODENOW offered the following resolution, and upon its adoption demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That during the present and every future session of Congress, each Representative and Delegate in Congress be furnished with such newspapers and publications as he shall select, not to exceed in amount per annum the cost of four daily papers.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question now being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, asked for tellers upon the call for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. JONES moved to lay the resolution upon the table; which motion was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was taken, and the resolution agreed to.

Mr. FULLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay that motion upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TUCK, in pursuance of previous notice, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoils committed by the French prior to the 31st day July, 1801; which having been read a first and second time by its title, Mr.

T. said there may be a difference of opinion in the House as to the allowance of these claims, but I think there should be no difference as to a proposition to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. BAYLY moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TUCK hoped that it would not be killed in that way.

Mr. DUNHAM moved that it be laid on the table.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred upon referring the bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. MEACHAM, agreeably to previous notice, on leave, introduced a bill providing for the payment of Vermont volunteers in the battle of Plattsburg; which having been read a first and second time by its title, Mr. M. moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DUNHAM moved its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was then taken upon referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon referring it to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN offered the following resolution:

Whereas the best interests of the country demand that the great and rapidly-increasing patronage of the Executive Department of the General Government be diminished, by transferring the power of appointment, whenever it can be done without prejudice to the public service from the Executive to the people; and whereas the appointment of more than twenty thousand deputy postmasters constitutes the largest branch of that vast patronage—

Be it therefore resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report, within thirty days, an amendment to the Constitution, by which Congress shall be empowered to provide, as far as practicable, for the election of deputy postmasters by the qualified voters in the respective localities in which post offices are situated: Provided, That if, in the opinion of said committee, Congress has already such constitutional power, said committee shall, instead of said amendment, report within the time aforesaid the bill to effect the aforesaid object.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. ALLEN demanded the previous question.

Mr. ORR. I propose to debate the resolution. Does it go over?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It goes over under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The resolution would go over after the first thirty days of the session.

Mr. ORR. I make the question with the Chair. Will the Chair decide it?

Mr. JONES. If the Speaker will refer to the 24th rule—that in relation to receiving petitions the first thirty days—he will find it as follows: "That petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place; a brief statement of the contents thereof shall be made verbally by the introducer; they shall not be debated on the day of their being presented."

The 25th rule says, that resolutions shall then be called for in the same order, and disposed of by the same rules which apply to petitions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, upon examining the 24th and 25th rules, and finding that resolutions must be disposed of in the same manner as petitions, changes his opinion, and the resolution must go over.

Mr. ORR. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then it will go over.

Mr. KING, of New York, offered the following resolution; which was read, and by unanimous consent considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House the correspondence upon which the claims of citizens of the United States against Portugal have been adjusted, if not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. HAWS, on leave, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels,' approved February 22, 1847; also to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels,'" approved May 17, 1845; which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BO E, on leave, introduced a joint resolution to grant land to the Hungarian exiles; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That one hundred and sixty acres of land be granted to each of the Hungarian citizens, who have been transported to this country by the orders of this Government; said land to be located by such Hungarian citizens from any lands belonging to this Government now unoccupied.

The question now was, Shall the resolution be read a second time?

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Objection having been made, the question will be, Shall the resolution be rejected?

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I ask the gentleman from New York to add a proviso to the joint resolution, that they go and live upon the land.

Mr. JONES. I move to reject the bill.

Mr. HALL. I would inquire if it is in order now to offer an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order until the resolution shall have been read a second time. It has been read the first time, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moves its rejection.

Mr. HALL. I want only to propose that our citizens shall be entitled to the same privileges as his Dutchmen. That is all.

Mr. GIDDINGS demanded the yeas and nays on the rejection of the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. This resolution is simply a resolution of the House, and it has not the words necessary to make it a joint resolution. I presume if it is proposed to debate it, it will go over under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] having moved a rejection of the resolution, in the opinion of the Chair that question will have to be taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I withdraw the motion to reject, as it is not a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] intend to debate the resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over.

Mr. EVANS. I ask whether it is not a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It has no title, but it is in the nature of a joint resolution.

Mr. EVANS. I wish merely to suggest to the Chair that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BOWNE,] when he offered that resolution, called for the previous question. After the gentleman had called for the previous question, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moved to reject the resolution. The motion for the previous question was not put by the Chair, and the gentleman had no right to interpose the proposition he made—thereby carrying the resolution over, unless the previous question was first rejected.

The SPEAKER. The House refused to second the call for the previous question.

Mr. EVANS. It may be so, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOWNE] tells me that the motion was not put.

Mr. BOWNE. I moved the previous question, but I do not understand that it was put.

The SPEAKER. I trust the gentleman from New York will be indulged in testing the sense of the House upon the call for the previous question.

Mr. HALL. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. STUART. I wish to inquire if it is a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk so reports it.

Mr. STUART. I would inquire if under the 59th rule it would go over?

The SPEAKER then read the 115th and 116th rules, as follow:

"Every bill shall receive three several readings in the House previous to its passage; and bills shall be dispatched in order as they were introduced, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but no bill shall be twice read on the same day, without special order of the House."

"The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and if opposition be made to it, the question shall be 'Shall this bill be rejected?'"

Mr. JONES. Has notice been given to the Clerk, under this rule, of an intention to introduce this resolution?

To this interrogatory no response was heard.

The SPEAKER. As the proposition is made to debate the resolution, it goes over; and unless there be an appeal from the decision of the Chair, he will so order it.

Mr. SACKETT introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to extend the patent heretofore granted to William Woodworth;'" which having been read a first and second time by its title, Mr. S. moved to refer it to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. TUCK moved to lay it upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, said the same bill had been killed over and over again. They had to kill it every session.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to lay on the table.

Mr. SACKETT said that gentlemen were mistaken in regard to the bill.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. TUCK said that, from the title of the bill, he inferred that it was a bill which had been repeatedly before Congress. He withdrew his motion.

Mr. ROBBINS renewed the motion to lay the bill upon the table; and, the question being put, it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on referring it to the Committee on Patents; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HASCALL, on leave, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, concerning invalid pensioners; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HAVEN, on leave, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, to reenact and continue in operation certain acts for the relief of insolvent debtors of the United States; which was read the first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BENNETT, on leave, introduced a joint resolution, (and desired that it might be put upon its passage,) to establish certain post routes; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BENNETT. I will only say a word upon the subject. I ask the consent of the House to let this resolution pass.

A MEMBER. It is not debatable.

Mr. BENNETT. The reason I ask this, it is a new and important route.

Mr. FICKLIN. There is a motion to commit it.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HEBARD offered a resolution; which was read as follows, viz:

Whereas Kosuth, in a speech by him lately delivered at New York, is reported to have declared that he considered the resolution recently passed and adopted by this House "has a political meaning;" Therefore,

Resolved, That said resolution was intended by this House to have no "political meaning;" nor to pledge this Government to any political action; but that it was intended merely as a testimonial of sympathy and respect for Kosuth, and the cause in which he is engaged.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I propose to say something upon that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution goes over, then, under the rule.

Mr. DISNEY. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the resolution goes over because the gentleman proposes to debate it?

The SPEAKER. That was the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the Chair refer me to the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair refers the gentleman to the 24th and 25th rules.

Mr. DISNEY. The 24th rule is in these words:

"Petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the House shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place; a brief statement of the contents thereof shall be made verbally by the introducer; they shall not be debated on the day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of petitions after the first thirty days of the session, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they are presented."

Now, here are two direct limitations upon the debate of the presentation of resolutions—upon the day of presentation, and again upon the day assigned by the House for the reception of petitions.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. Is there any question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rises to a question of order.

Mr. JONES. Has there been an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DISNEY. I will suggest to the Chair—

Mr. JONES. All I want is, if the gentleman from Ohio makes a speech, I wish to be heard in reply. If there is no appeal, it will be said I have no right to speak.

Mr. DISNEY. I have no desire to make a speech, but informally to make these remarks as a suggestion to the Chair; but as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has avowed his desire to make a reply, for the sole and only purpose of gratifying the gentleman from Tennessee, I do make an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. TUCK. As this appeal is taken for the only reason, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] to enable him and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to have a little exercise in public debating, I would suggest to him, if it would not be better for the public, that this debate should take place in some committee-room, or any other private room? [Laughter.]

A brief discussion here took place between Mr. DISNEY, and Mr. JONES of Tennessee, relative to the decision previously made by the Chair, that resolutions giving rise to debate must lie over, Mr. D. citing the rules to show that debate was in order, and Mr. J. sustaining the decision of the Chair. The appeal was then withdrawn. These remarks, owing to the imperfect manner in which they were heard, the Reporter is constrained to omit.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the value of the specie coin of the United States as to make the real and nominal value of said coin equal.

Mr. PRICE, on leave, introduced a bill, of which previous notice had been given, "to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to contract for carrying the mails between Jersey City, in the State New Jersey, and port of New York, and Galway, or any other port which may be selected, on the west coast of Ireland."

The bill was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. PRICE moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DUNHAM moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The question was first taken on Mr. PRICE's motion; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. DUNHAM's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to ascertain as soon as possible the legal expenses of the contested election in the Fourth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, and pay the same out of the contingent fund of the House; and that he also be directed to pay to John S. Littell, the contestant, his mileage and per diem allowance, from the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-first Congress until the 11th September, when the contest was determined.

Several gentlemen desiring to debate the resolution, it was laid over, under the rule.

Mr. McNAIR. It is well known that there are a great many Germans in many parts of the United States. In my own district—and no doubt in many others—there are many of them who are very anxious to have the President's message printed in the German language, in order that they may be able to read it. If this be not done, they are entirely cut off from knowing what the message contains, unless they have a clerk to read it to them, and in the agricultural districts they are not much accustomed to having clerks to read to them. I therefore hope that it will be the pleasure of the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the President's message be printed in the German language.

Mr. ORR desiring to debate the resolution, it was laid over.

Mr. RIDDLE. I desire to offer a resolution, which is upon the same subject—although it differs in effect—as the resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] and which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not desire to debate the resolution further than to say, that all the objections urged against the resolution yesterday, are obviated by the one which I now offer. If it is read, I feel confident that it will meet with the concurrence of the whole House, as, I am assured, it does meet with the concurrence of the Committee on Public Buildings. The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the appropriation for the improvement of the Capitol has been exhausted: Therefore Be it resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be and he is hereby authorized to continue in service, until an appropriation shall hereafter be made, such mechanics and laborers as may, in his opinion, be demanded by the interests of the Government.

Mr. RIDDLE demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Is it in order to offer an amendment to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, as the previous question is demanded.

Mr. FULLER. Then I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. VENABLE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. ORR and MEACHAM were appointed.

Mr. WALSH. I submit to the Chair that we have no power to appropriate money, except by joint resolution; and as this resolution necessarily involves an appropriation, it is not in the proper form.

The SPEAKER. That may be a reason for voting down the resolution, but the Chair cannot upon that ground rule it out of order.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 61.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. EVANS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House whether any, and if any, what measures he may deem necessary to prevent the exportation of silver coin, and whether he recommend to Congress any new adjustment of the relative value of gold and silver; and also whether, in his opinion, seigniorage or charge upon the coinage of silver coin be necessary or proper.

The resolution having been read,
Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, desiring to debate the resolution, it was laid over under the rule.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House a statement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Maryland, for advances of money made by said State to the General Government during the war of 1812; and that he also communicate a statement of the account between the United States and the said State for money advanced by Maryland to aid in the erection of the Capitol at Washington.

Mr. BOWIE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia inquire into the expediency and practicability of preventing the issue and circulation of small notes, under the denomination of five dollars, in the District of Columbia, and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved, &c., That the Executive documents, the printing of additional copies of which have been ordered during the present session, or may, during either session of the present Congress be ordered by either House of Congress, and the size of which shall not be less than 250 pages, such additional copies shall be bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing: Provided, That the cost shall not exceed twelve and a half cents per volume for the whole number ordered.

Mr. S. stated that this resolution was precisely similar to the one passed by the last Congress. The joint resolution having been read twice, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

Mr. S. moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLINGMAN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the 17th standing rule as provides for the admission of certain persons therein named within the Hall of the House of Representatives, be so modified as to embrace Governor Louis Kossuth, of Hungary; and that the Speaker of the House be requested to communicate the same to Governor Kossuth.

The resolution having been read,
Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the previous question on its adoption.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe that a motion to amend the rules cannot be made without one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is right.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was in hopes that the gentleman from Tennessee would have offered no objection to this resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do object to it. We have enough admitted now.

The resolution was then laid over.

Mr. AIKEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of allowing bounty land to the Washington Light Infantry, Washington Volunteers, German Fusiliers, and Hamburg Volunteers, of South Carolina, who were engaged in the Florida war, and were discharged before the expiration of one month from the commencement of their term of service; and that the accompanying papers be and are hereby referred to said committee.

The resolution having been read,
Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved to amend it, by inserting after the words "term of service," the words:

"Also, all those who were engaged in the removal of the Cherokee nation west of the Mississippi, from 1835 to 1838."

Mr. MEACHAM moved to amend the amendment, by adding thereto the words:

"And also the Vermont volunteers who were engaged in the Battle of Plattsburg."

Mr. AIKEN. I object to those amendments. The gentlemen can bring in resolutions of their own.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.
Mr. ORR demanded the previous question, with a view of cutting off further amendments.

The previous question was not sustained.
The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER. I propose now further to amend the amendment, by adding at the heel of it these words: "and all the rest of mankind." [Great laughter.]

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. I propose further to amend the amendment, so as to include the soldiers of the revolutionary war who served less than six months and more than one month. No provision has ever been made for them.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he proposes that those soldiers of the revolutionary war shall locate their lands here or in eternity? [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I think the question is not relevant, and I therefore decline to answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCURRY. I propose to amend the amendment, so as to make it include all those who served in the revolution in Texas. [A laugh.]

The SPEAKER. There is already an amendment to the amendment pending, and the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is not therefore in order.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand that the previous question has been demanded and refused.

The SPEAKER. It was not seconded.

Mr. GORMAN. I believe the House is now prepared to sustain the previous question, and therefore I demand it.

The question being taken on seconding the call for the previous question, there were ayes 63, noes 36. No quorum voting.

On the motion of Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, the House then adjourned.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

By Mr. HAWS: A bill in relation to the office of assistant treasurer, in the city of New York.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following memorials, petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:
By Mr. JOHN W. HOWE: The petition of E. Kingsbury and 39 others, citizens of Butler county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to establish a mail route from Pittsburg, via Allegheny City, Perryville, Wexford, Zelienople, Harmony, Whitestown, Prospect, Centerville, Hamsville, and Wesley, to Franklin, Venango county, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky: The petition of sundry citizens of Grant county, Kentucky, praying that arrearages of pensions may be paid to George Williams, who was wounded in the war of 1812.

Also, the memorial of Aaron Adams, of Grant county, Kentucky, an invalid pensioner, asking an increase of pension, and compensation for a horse lost in the Indian war of 1812.

By Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. The petition of Thomas K. Knowland, for himself and others, praying for the establishment of a post route.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1851.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

PETITIONS.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Charles Fletcher, proposing to establish a line of steam-packets between Norfolk, Virginia, and the ports of Cadiz and Gibraltar in Spain, and praying that the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized to contract with him for carrying the mail between those ports; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE presented the memorial of Caleb Dustin, praying the redemption of certain continental money issued to his grandfather for his services in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in favor of the establishment of a Bureau of Agriculture in the Department of the Interior at Washington.

Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BORLAND presented a memorial of Robert Mills, architect, praying to be allowed an opportunity to justify his acts as Architect and Superintendent of the Patent Office wing building, against certain charges made against them by the Commissioner of Public Buildings in his report to the Department of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of the assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census of King's county, New York, praying to be allowed additional compensation for their services; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRATT submitted additional evidence in relation to the claim of the legal representatives of William Somerville, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BUTLER submitted additional evidence in relation to the petition of the representatives of John Moore, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of Derrill H. Darby, for himself and the other heirs of Colonel William Johnson, an officer in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed commutation pay.

Colonel Johnson is well known from his historical reputation. He was a soldier in the revolutionary continental service. He performed a gallant part in the battle at Fort Moultrie, and served from that time until the capitulation of Charleston, in May, 1780. Colonel Johnson and his regiment were prisoners of war, and continued so until an exchange of prisoners was ordered in May, 1781; so that he claims commutation pay as a soldier or officer in the service of the Revolution, until October, 1780; because the law provides, that those who served till that time, without resignation or being cashiered, shall be entitled to this commutation pay. Although this is the provision of the law, neither he nor his representatives ever received this pay. This is one of those claims which I would especially commend to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I move that the petition be referred to that committee.

The petition was so referred.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of Francis Gardere, praying compensation for certain land claimed by him under a Spanish grant, and occupied by the United States for military purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of the administrator of Joshua B. Smith, deceased, praying compensation for the use of a vessel employed under a contract with a Government officer in transporting troops during the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of John H. Patterson, praying compensation for his services as a lieutenant in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of C. H. Blood, praying compensation for supplies furnished to a company of Florida volunteers in the Seminole war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of Sarah Flinn, praying compensation for supplies furnished the troops of the United States in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of David Osburn, praying compensation for corn and fodder furnished the troops of the United States in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of John W. W. Jackson, praying compensation for a horse killed in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of José Baya, praying compensation for a horse lost in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of Leslie Combs, praying the payment of certain bonds issued to him by the late Republic of Texas.

The memorialist represents that he holds Texas bonds for the sum of $69,200; that he has filed these bonds in the Treasury Department, with the view of obtaining compensation according to the act granting ten millions of dollars to Texas; that the Treasury Department, according to the statement of this memorialist, had ascertained that there were more than twelve millions of these Texan bonds falling within the provisions contemplated by the act of Congress. The memorialist says that the Government therefore refuse to pay him or any of the holders of these bonds unless they will agree to accept such a proportion of the twelve millions of dollars as five millions will pay, thus scaling him down to less than one half. He concludes his memorial by saying that the United States never intended to disgrace themselves or to dishonor the Government by repudiating an acknowledged debt, and he hopes that provision will be made for paying him the whole of his $69,200. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was so referred.

Mr. U. I also present a memorial of John A. Rajan, proposing to execute a plan discovered by him for draining the lands overflowed by the Mississippi and its tributaries, on condition of a grant of a portion of the lands reclaimed.

This memorial is of vast importance, if the project proposed can be accomplished. The memorialist is a native of Georgia, but is now a citizen of the parish of Natchitoches, in the State of Louisiana. He states, that after much attention and study, he has discovered a plan to prevent the overflowing of the Mississippi river, so as to throw the surplus water into Hudson's Bay in one direction, and through Texas in the other. He proposes to accomplish all this, if Congress will but give him the one half of the lands which he will save by this operation; and he proposes to have the work completed in ten years, if Congress will patronize him. I think, sir, that we should make a most admirable bargain, if we could accomplish so great a work at this price. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The memorial was so referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Cadwalader Wallace, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of merchants, ship-owners, and others, inhabitants of Portland, Maine, on the files of the Senate, relating to the establishment of a marine hospital at that place, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of William Beatty, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. FISH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill amendatory of the act entitled "An act to provide for holding the courts of the United States, in case of sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts."

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to present a joint resolution for the establishment of post routes in the State of New York.

LAKE SUPERIOR IRON REGION.

Mr. FELCH submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That five thousand five hundred additional copies of the Report of Messrs. Foster and Whitney, in relation to the iron region of Lake Superior, Michigan, which was ordered to be printed by the resolution of the Senate of the 13th March last, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that three hundred copies thereof be furnished to the Smithsonian Institution for distribution, and two hundred copies to Messrs. Foster and Whitney.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution by unanimous consent, and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Eliza C. Bache, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the widows and relatives of certain officers and seamen of the United States brig Washington, who were lost overboard in a hurricane.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

THE BRIG ADA.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the brig Ada; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. DOWNS. I hope that the Senate will agree to consider this bill now.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill is in the usual form required for such bills, and is one of that class that is never objected to. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to this brig Ada, upon its being shown that she has been thoroughly repaired, and that the repairs have exceeded three fourths of the original cost of construction. As the owners of the vessel cannot employ her, or send her out without this register, I trust that the consent of the Senate will be given to dispose of the matter now.

The bill was then read a second time; and, having been considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, it was reported back without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MISSISSIPPI AND ALABAMA RAILROAD.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Pursuant to previous notice, I ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and a donation of public land, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

Leave was granted, and the bill was read a first time.

Mr. FOOTE. I ask that this bill may be read a second time now.

The PRESIDENT. With a view to reference?

Mr. FOOTE. No, sir; I think this is a case in which the Senate will concur with me that reference is not necessary. I wish to make a simple statement with reference to this bill. This is a bill which passed the Senate last session without the least opposition from any quarter, but failed in the other House for want of time. It involves a little land in the State of Mississippi which is not of any present value to the Government. It is a matter of great importance to many persons interested in railways that it should be acted upon, and I hope that under all the circumstances the Senate will agree to its second reading.

The bill was then read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BORLAND. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and I do so not with any intention of opposing the bill, for I think that when it comes before the Senate, if it be reported favorably upon by the committee, I shall vote for it very cordially. But I hold that taking up a bill without reference, and passing it simply because it has passed the Senate at a previous Congress, is giving it precedence and advantage over other bills which have similar objects in view. I have introduced two bills equally as important as this, and which passed the Senate last Congress, but were left wholly neglected by the House. These bills have been again referred, and I think this one ought to be referred also.

Mr. FOOTE. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas will do me the justice to say that I have never manifested a desire to depart from the usual order of doing business in the Senate, and that it is but rarely that I have come forward to ask anything for the State which I represent. I may be allowed to state, however, that in two days from this time, my State will be entirely unrepresented here. That is a fact; and I hope, therefore, that this bill may be considered as an exception, and be allowed to pass. I think the honorable Senator from Arkansas will admit that I have usually given him my support when he has had anything before the Senate, in which the interest of his State was concerned, and I hope he will extend to me his courtesy on this occasion. This measure, at the last session, was referred to a committee, and underwent the fullest investigation. Several amendments were proposed, and with these amendments it passed the Senate. I can assure the honorable Senator from Arkansas that the facts connected with this bill are rather peculiar. The lands have been suspended from sale with a view of securing to the State of Mississippi the advantages which were expected to arise from the passage of this law. Its passage we have been in the habit of looking upon as a fixed fact, and its suspension will create great inconvenience. I am informed by gentlemen connected with this railroad, that the engineers have laid it out, and that they are prepared for substantial and practical action. They are only waiting for this bill to pass, in order that they may take such steps as will bring about the speedy consummation of the work. I hope, therefore, that, under all the circumstances, it will be allowed to pass. It is, most probably, the last time that I shall ever ask the Senate for any favor.

Mr. BORLAND. I have never in my life refused an act of courtesy. I therefore yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. FELCH. I do not rise for the purpose of making any objection to the last request of the Senator from Mississippi, but simply to say that this bill is in precisely the form approved by the Committee on Public Lands last session, and adopted by the Senate, and that this bill is like all others of a similar character. Many bills have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands asking for similar grants. That committee have not yet fully consulted upon the subject; but they intend to take the whole matter into their consideration—the form which was adopted last session, and also with the view of adopting such amendments as may be suggested. I have no objection to the particular form, nor have I any objection to the bill; but I think it my duty to state this fact.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate will pass this bill. I have no doubt that the next form will be more liberal, and I think we shall gain something by passing this bill thus early. [A laugh.]

The bill was then reported back to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill granting the right of way for, and to aid in, the construction of a line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FELCH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following bills:

A bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of lake Michigan; and

A bill to revive and continue in force for a limited time the provisions of an act relative to suspended entries of public lands.

The said bills were read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MANGUM, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of the personal representatives of William A. Slacum, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill for the relief of Margaret L. Worth; and
A bill to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, for the additional services required under that act.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ROBB, Chief Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed the following joint resolutions:

Joint resolution providing for the binding of certain documents;

Joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to legalize certain contracts for the transportation of the mail in California and Oregon; and Joint resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journals and public documents.

In which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. BRIGHT. There is a joint resolution before the Senate providing for the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census. The public interest would be promoted by early action upon it, and I think it my duty to call to it the attention of the Senate. As there is, however, other business before us to-day, I shall not insist upon calling it up for consideration at this time, but would move that it be made the special order of the day for Monday next, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I make a brief explanation in regard to the report of what occurred here yesterday.

Mr. FOOTE. I know very well what the gentleman from New Hampshire is about to be at, and I rise to oppose his explanation, not from any discourtesy towards him, as he well knows. But I know very well, and he knows it also, that as soon as he makes his explanation, three or four other Senators will be on the floor in a few seconds to make their explanations also, and thus I shall be cut off from any opportunity of being heard on the question which comes up as the special order. I appeal to the gentleman, therefore, whether he will not withhold his explanation for the present.

Mr. HALE. I shall not occupy two minutes.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire, according to the usage of the Senate, has a right to make his explanation.

Mr. HALE. This is but the second time, Mr. President, that I have ever asked the indulgence of the Senate for such a purpose, and in all probability it will be the last. In the debate of yesterday I remarked that—"There was a great constitutional question of law, upon which there was difficulty. I allude to the question whether slavery was or was not abolished in the territories acquired from Mexico by the operation of the Mexican laws. It was remarked as a very astonishing fact upon the floor of the Senate, that every Senator who spoke on that subject, living south of a certain geographical line, took one view of the constitutional question, and those living north of that geographical line, took a contrary view.

"Mr. WALKER, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and others. It is not so.

"Mr. DOUGLAS. That is contrary to the fact."

I now want to read a few words from a speech delivered by Thomas Corwin, late Senator from the State of Ohio. I do not mean Thomas Corwin, Secretary of the Treasury, but Thomas Corwin, late Senator from the State of Ohio. It is from the Congressional Globe, and is as follows:

"What is there in the way, then, of my giving an intelligent vote on this subject? Nothing at all. I would take this bill in a moment, if I had faith in the processes through which that law is to pass until it becomes a law in the Chamber below. But I have not that faith, and I will tell the gentleman why. It is a sad commentary upon the perfection of human reason, that with but very few exceptions, gentlemen coming from a slave State—and I think I have one behind me, who ought always to be before me, [Mr. BADGER]—with a very few exceptions, all eminent lawyers on that floor from that section of the country, have argued that you have no right to prohibit the introduction of slavery into Oregon, California, and New Mexico; while, on the other hand, there is not a man, with few exceptions, (and some highly respectable,) in the free States, learned or unlearned, clerical or lay, who has any pretensions to legal knowledge, but believes in his conscience that you have a right to prohibit slavery. Is not that a curious commentary upon that wonderful thing called human reason?"

"Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is regulated by a line."

I have done, sir. That is all the explanation I have to make.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the report is read there, it would seem to convey the idea that I questioned the veracity of the Senator, when I said that such was not the fact. I referred to the declaration by which he made it appear that all on one side of the line had taken one view of the matter, and all on the other side had taken another and an opposite view of it. It may have been true that a Senator had previously made such a statement upon this floor. That was not my denial. My denial was, that if any Senator had made such a statement, that statement was not true in fact. It seems now that Mr. Corwin once said in the Senate, that, with few exceptions, those on the one side had voted in one way, and, with few exceptions, those on the other side had voted the other way. But whether the exceptions constituted the majority or the minority, the Senate has now no means of ascertaining. I know a large number of Senators from the South, who are eminent lawyers, who took the view that these laws were in force; and others, again, from the North who took the view that these laws were not in force, but there was no division such as has been spoken of by a geographical line. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire yesterday to say that the South had been unanimous in one view of the question, while the North had been equally. I am not aware that a question of law or of constitutional construction ever arose in this body on which all the Northern members took the one side and the Southern Senators took the other. It was this proposition which I denied when I said that such was not the fact.

I will now say, in this connection, that so far as I have been familiar with the proceedings of the Supreme Court, that body has never brought itself under any just suspicion in regard to their opinions on this matter as a legal or constitutional question. The gentlemen from the North on the Supreme Bench, as their decisions will show, have uniformly, firmly, and rigidly adhered to and protected the constitutional rights of the South, as the gentlemen on that bench who were born in the Southern States. There has frequently been a diversity of opinion among the judges of the Supreme Court on points of law and constitutional construction that might affect this slavery question; but where that diversity has existed, the Southern judges have been divided amongst themselves, and the Northern judges have also been divided amongst themselves; but never has it been known that the judges from the North, collectively, have taken one view of the question, and the judges of the South, collectively, taken another and a different view of it. If you examine the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question, you will see an entire absence of this supposed bias or impression on the minds of the judges, growing out of locality of interest, or association, or birth. I have been gratified that such has always been the case in the past, and I trust it will always continue to be the case in the future; that whatever may be the differences of opinion which exist in this body, or elsewhere, the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States is never to be affected or influenced, or to be rendered subject even to the suspicion of entering into any of those local feelings to which reference has been made. I believe that that court is above all such imputations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the gentleman from New Hampshire to say that he made no exception. I do not know that he used the term "no exception," but he certainly made none in the course of his remarks. My only object in rising yesterday was to show that there were exceptions. Now, sir, I will admit what I said at the time of Mr. Corwin's making his speech, that the majority of members on the south side of 36° 30' denied the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the Territories, and contended that they had a right to take and hold their slaves in the Territories under the Constitution regardless of Mexican laws; and that the majority on the other side of the line were of a different opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. What has this to do with this question?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is very unwilling ing to interrupt gentlemen, but he must say that this debate is altogether irregular. The gentleman from New Hampshire got up for the purpose of making an explanation, and he read an extract from a speech of a gentleman formerly a member of this body. This discussion is out of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rose, also, to make an explanation. The gentleman from New Hampshire read what I said when Mr. Corwin made his speech, as if what I said then contradicted what I said yesterday. It does not. I admit that a geographical line seemed to control the opinions of majorities. But it was not universal, as I understood the gentleman to affirm. There were exceptions.

A SENATOR. Well, well; now move the special order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will call for the special order.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution declaring the measures of adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Mr. BADGER. I have an amendment to offer to this resolution. It is for the purpose of relieving it of two objections which may be taken against it, one of them perhaps having some intrinsic force, and the other, I think, without any intrinsic, but having some apparent force. The first objection to which I allude, is as follows: The resolution, as it now stands, undertakes to declare, in respect to the series of measures constituting the compromise, what is the duty of the public at large. The second is, that it implies, or may be made to intimate, that the Senate suppose that the acts of legislation referred to are irrepealable, or that it is beyond the power of Congress to modify them. I know that this was not the intention of the mover of the resolution; but as it is important, if it should be adopted, that it should be distinctly understood, I suggest an amendment which I think will avoid all difficulty, and express with clearness and precision what is designed by it. It is to strike out of the resolution the words—

"Entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery, and as such, that said measures should be acquiesced in and faithfully observed by all good citizens"

And insert as follows:

"A settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse."

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. I accept the amendment with great pleasure. I am not particular about the phraseology of the resolution. What I wish is, to get a large vote in its favor.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi is not privileged to accept it. The question must be taken upon it.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to, there being on a division—yeas 24, nays not counted.

The resolution therefore now stands as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850;

"An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to an act entitled, 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, then addressed the Senate at length, giving his views in favor of the resolution, and in reply to the speeches of Mr. BUTLER and Mr. RHETT. [For which see APPENDIX.]

Without concluding, Mr. F. gave way to a motion to adjourn.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 18, 1851.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the State Department, covering a statement showing that of the $10,000 appropriated last session for the expenses of the agent of the Sublime Porte, the sum of $4,051 81 had been expended for that purpose, and that there was a balance remaining in the Treasury of said appropriation of $5,948 19; which communication,

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the War Department, showing the expenditures in the several bureaus in said Department of their contingent funds, in compliance with the twentieth section of the act of August, 1842; which,

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

INDIGENT INSANE.

Mr. BISSELL asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, with the view to its commitment, making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no disposition to object to this bill. But the introduction of a bill at this time is altogether out of order; and if the House will proceed in regular order, in the course of an hour and a half all these bills can be introduced and be perfectly in order. I therefore call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill cannot be introduced.

BRANCH MINT IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McCORKLE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up Senate bill No. 6, for the establishment of a branch of the Mint of the United States in California, in order that it may be referred.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion by Mr. DISNEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Samuel Allen be withdrawn from the files of the House, and, together with the petition of the Hon. A. Allen, now presented, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. D., it was also Ordered, That the papers in relation to Hiram Powers be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order of business.

PETITIONS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called, the States and Territories will be called for petitions, commencing with the Territory of Utah.

Mr. BERNHISEL presented the petition of Robert Owen, George A. Smith, and other citizens of the Territory of Utah, praying for the establishment of a monthly mail route from San Diego, California, via Barrow, to Great Salt Lake City; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SCURRY presented two several petitions of citizens of Arkansas, Texas, and Louisiana, praying for the removal of the raft in the Red river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FICKLIN presented the petition of Silas Noble and other officers of the land office at Dixon, Illinois, praying compensation for locating military bounty land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MOLONY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given, to correct an error in the pension of Orris Crosby.

The SPEAKER. It will be read, if there is no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill cannot be received.

Mr. MOLONY. Then I present the petition of Orris Crosby, praying for the correction of a mistake in the pension of Orris Crosby; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, presented the petition of A. J. Sharpless, A. E. Hamilton, Wm. C. Kennett, and two hundred and eighty others; also the petition of the passengers and crew of the steamer Fleetwood, praying for an appropriation from the national Treasury of such an amount as will be necessary to purchase the small remaining private stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal, and to make the same free of tolls and to suit the wants of commerce.

Mr. M. I have also in my hands a bill connected with the same subject, which I ask leave now to present, in order that it may be referred. I ask that the bill may be read, and that it may be, together with the petitions, referred to a select committee.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. M. I move that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. That is the appropriate committee.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not wish to trespass upon the jurisdiction of any regular committee of this House; but it does seem to me that the usual rules which govern the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] might be waived, and that I might be permitted to give this bill, covering a subject of so much importance, into the hands of its friends, who will have an opportunity to present their views, connected with the subject, to the House in a form more imposing than is done ordinarily. And I trust that the Speaker, in the selection of that committee, will place upon it the representatives of the sections most particularly interested in the variety of schemes connected with the subject already presented to the House.

Mr. JONES. We have standing committees of the House, and it seems to me that the rule which should govern the action of the House should be, that when a bill or proposition is offered here it should be referred to the appropriate standing committee, unless there be some good reason against it. If there is any good reason why this bill to purchase the individual stock in the Louisville and Portland canal should not go to the Committee on Roads and Canals, I have no objection to a select committee. But as a general rule, I think a select committee should not be appointed when the subject to be investigated comes within the legitimate sphere of a standing committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to inquire if this subject, giving rise to debate, does not go over?

The SPEAKER. This subject was taken up by unanimous consent, therefore the gentleman's point is overruled.

Mr. JONES. All I have to say, Mr. Speaker, is, that it is a wrong policy to raise select committees for the examination and investigation of subjects which properly belong to a standing committee, unless there is some good and valid reason why the standing committee to which it appropriately belongs should not have charge of this subject.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have very little pride or personal ambition about this matter; but inasmuch as I have the honor of standing at the head of the Committee on Roads and Canals, I feel it my duty to resist this attempt to take subjects properly belonging to that committee and refer them to a select committee. The subject-matter of the petition presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has already been referred by a vote of this House to the Committee on Roads and Canals. If, therefore, you raise a select committee, you will have this subject distributed to two different committees. If it is the pleasure of the House to abolish the Committee on Roads and Canals, I shall make little or no objection to it, as I will then have no work to do; but inasmuch as this subject belongs clearly to that committee, I hope the House will adhere to the rule and send it to them.

The question was taken upon referring the bill and petitions to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and they were so referred.

On motion by Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, it was Ordered, That the papers in regard to the claims of Cassius M. Clay, Stanton Gaar, and John Poe, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HUNTER asked the general consent of the House to introduce a resolution; but objection being made it was not received.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the memorial of Thomas J. Durant and others, citizens of New Orleans, praying Congress to pass a law which will enable him to bring a suit against the United States, to obtain a judicial decision upon a claim which he prefers against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BELL presented a petition, prepared by the Colonization Society of Greene county, Ohio, and signed by seventy-nine citizens of that county, asking Congress to recognize the independence of the Republic of Liberia; and praying that Congress establish a line of steamers to run from the United States to said Republic of Liberia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GAYLORD presented the petition of Levi Deaver, Francis Pettit, and one hundred and thirty others, citizens of Morgan county, Ohio, asking Congress to carefully consider the unconstitutionality, injustice, and oppression of the national Chaplaincy system, and to abolish the office of Chaplain wherever it may exist by the authority of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. ST. MARTIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Mitchell, James M. Howard, and Moses H. Coats, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, on motion by Mr. ST. MARTIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the heirs of Cattalina Radon, formerly Cattalina Montemar, be taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. MOORE, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the petition of John A. Regan, praying to be allowed to drain such lakes in the Mississippi valley as he may designate, on certain conditions, be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, asked the general consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given; but objection being made, it was not received.

Mr. FREEMAN asked the general consent of the House to introduce a bill; but objection being made, it was not received.

On motion by Mr. FREEMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Anna C. De Neuville Evans, and A. B. Dawson, be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio, presented a memorial in regard to patents, and the draft of a law for the protection of patentees; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion by Mr. MEADE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Samuel Jones be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FLORENCE presented the petition of William Abbott, harbor-master, and Harman Yerkes, master-warden, and others in the city of Philadelphia, and the pilots navigating the Delaware bay and harbor, and other citizens of the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, praying for the erection of a pier and harbor to afford better shelter for vessels navigating said bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER asked the general consent of the House to offer resolutions; which were read for information, as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be and he is hereby authorized to cause such arrangement to be made in the interior of the Hall, as may be deemed necessary to the comfort and health of the members. Also,

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be and he is hereby authorized to appoint an additional assistant, if he deem it necessary to the proper execution of the duties of his office.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a privileged question, and I trust my friend will not object. I am, as many others are, doomed, by a species of lottery, to take a seat out here upon the boundaries of civilization; but I will be well content with that distance if—

Mr. EVANS. I call the gentleman to order.

[Cries of "Leave!" "Leave!" "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. CHANDLER. I will be well content to occupy this place, but I object to the hyperborean winds that blow in upon my back, and I ask some remedy for that. I do not like this attack in the rear. I beseech the House, therefore, to allow me the privilege of presenting resolutions which look towards a remedy. We are, day by day, attempting to pass laws here for putting money into this man's and that man's pocket, to the comfort and convenience of the people; but salus populi suprema est lex—the great law of the land is the health and comfort of the legislators. [Laughter.] I hope, therefore, that it will be heard, and approved, and passed.

[Cries—"I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. CHANDLER. It seems to be an interior gentleman who objects. Is the first resolution objected to?

[Cries—"No!" "No!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read the first resolution.

The first resolution was then read as above.

Mr. SCURRY. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, what he means by the comfort of the members? I do not understand it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I submit to the Chair, whether it is not a question of privilege?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a question of privilege entirely, whether the House vote it down or not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It was decided by the Speaker of the last Congress, that the election of a Doorkeeper, which touched the organization of the House, was a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. That is very true; but the election of Doorkeeper is provided for by the rules of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. A proposition touching the health and comfort of the members is a privileged question, and, of course, overrides all others.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SCURRY. I have no doubt there are many here—Whigs and Democrats—who would be desirous of getting friends to administer to their comfort; but I would like to know what comfort they would provide.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me have only a word upon the second resolution.

Objection was made.

Mr. C. then withdrew the resolution.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. FULLER, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Carbondale, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to make suitable provision for the erection of a line of telegraphs from Fort Independence to some eligible point on the Pacific coast; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of New York, presented the petition of the supervisors and others of the towns in the county of Onondaga, New York, asking that bounty land may be granted to the officers, musicians, and privates of the twenty-seventh brigade of New York militia, who were ordered into the service October 25, 1814, and discharged on the 27th November, at Sackett's Harbor, one hundred miles from home; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to inquire and report by bill or otherwise upon granting bounty lands to the persons serving in the brigade mentioned in the petition, and to all who rendered service under similar circumstances.

Mr. HASCALL gave notice that he will, tomorrow, or at some subsequent time, ask leave to introduce a bill to be entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes,'" approved March 3, 1851.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, presented the petition of Samuel Adams and others, with an accompanying paper of Castine Hancock to himself, praying for the erection of a light-house on the island of Au-Haute, in Penobscot bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Hiram R. Nason, and other citizens of Crawford, Washington county, Maine, praying for the establishment of a post road through said town; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PENNIMAN submitted joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, relative to moneys advanced by said State to the United States, and for the amount paid by the State for expenses incurred while a Territory in maintaining the territorial boundary; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BISSELL asked leave to introduce a bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union, for the benefit of the indigent insane.

Objection being made, leave was not granted.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to legalize certain contracts for the transportation of the mail in California and Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. O. said: As I intend to ask the House to put the resolution upon its passage, I will say a few words in explanation. It will be recollected by the members of the last House that this bill passed the Senate, and was lost in this body, at the moment of the adjournment, under a call for the previous question and the yeas and nays. It authorized the Postmaster General to make proposals for carrying the mail in California and Oregon, the contracts to be opened and acted upon at San Francisco. Objection was then made, in consequence of the belief of some members that it would establish a sub-department of the Post Office in California. The Postmaster General, acting upon the supposition that the law would pass, had the advertisements made in California and Oregon, and ordered the contracts to be opened in San Francisco; but the bill having failed in this House there was not time for readvertisement. The proposals consequently were opened at San Francisco, and adopted, with the reservation indorsed upon the contracts that they could be abrogated by the Department at any time it saw proper. The Postmaster General states in his report, that these contracts have been made upon advantageous terms—much lower than those made previously. He does not ask that there shall be a sub-department there, but merely that these contracts thus entered into shall be legalized and continued until 1854, the same period as other contracts in the Northwestern and Southwestern division of the mail contracts for the United States are to exist. The resolution does away with all the objections urged before the last House, and the legalization of these contracts saves the necessity of readvertisement and re-letting.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Subsequently, having been engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

Mr. OLDS moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Joint Committee on Printing, reported a resolution providing for the printing of one hundred copies of the Journal and documents of the House of Representatives in addition to the number now printed, to be deposited with the Secretary of State for distribution according to law.

Mr. G. said he would make simply this remark, that the Secretary of State addressed a letter to the Clerk of this House, informing him that the usual number of copies was insufficient, and would not supply the officers of our four Territories with the public documents.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and subsequently, having been engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the unfinished business of yesterday; which was the resolution offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN], providing bounty land to certain volunteers in the Florida war. The question immediately pending was upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ORR rose to a privileged question. He moved that when this House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was rejected.

Mr. WALSH moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up and considering the resolution relating to the workmen upon the Capitol, and upon that motion called for the yeas and nays; which call was subsequently withdrawn, and the motion rejected.

Mr. SMART moved that the House adjourn.

The yeas and nays were called for, but not ordered.

[A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that that body had passed the bill entitled "An act to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public moneys, under the 15th section of the act of 6th May, 1846, under the additional security required by said act;" also, "An act for the relief of Margaret L. Worth."]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, requested to be permitted to suggest to the mover to withdraw his motion for adjournment until the President's message was referred. There were important matters in that document to be referred to committees of the House.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and agreed to—yeas 88, nays 74.

The House then adjourned until Monday.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

By Mr. FAULKNER: A bill to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States.

The joint resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journals and Public Documents, was read a first and second time by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the brig Ada; and

A bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way, and a donation of public land, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Brandon to the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, viz: the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE, and amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER, as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the question growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplement to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, who was entitled to the floor, resumed and concluded the speech commenced yesterday; the report of which is withheld, at his request, for revision. [It will be published in the APPENDIX.]

Mr. HOUSTON next obtained the floor, but he gave way to

Mr. RHETT, who desired to make a brief reply. He, however, also yielded to the request of Senators. And the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 20, 1851.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I present the petition of the Industrial Congress of the city of New York, praying for the adoption by the Government of the United States of a policy in its diplomatic relations with foreign Powers which shall favor all struggles for freedom worthy the genius of a democratic people.

The memorial, which is as follows, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Industrial Congress of the city of New York, deeply sensible of the benefits and blessings flowing from free institutions and republican government—the happy possession of the American people—are anxious that those blessings should extend to, and be enjoyed by, the entire family of man.

The last few years have witnessed many manful efforts and heroic struggles on the part of the people of the Old World, to cast off the yokes of despotism and monarchical government, and erect in their stead forms of government more in consonance with the principles of democratic liberty.

These struggles have not yet ceased. The fire of liberty has not yet been quenched, but is burning with an intensity in the bosoms of our European brethren equalled only by that which pervaded our fathers in America's earlier career.

The Industrial Congress esteem it the religious duty of a people so fortunately situated as are the people of the United States, to manifest their sympathy and extend their aid in behalf of the depressed of other lands. It therefore respectfully memorializes your honorable bodies so to modify the foreign policy of the Government of the United States as to admit of a practical expression of sympathy and extension of aid, on the part of our people, in behalf of such victims of European despotism as may hereafter desire and require it.

In thus memorializing the Congress of the United States, the Industrial Congress would not be understood as seeking to involve our Government in foreign war, to infringe upon our treaties with other nations, nor to disturb our international law. On the contrary, we simply ask that in our diplomatic relations with foreign Powers, a position shall be assumed and maintained in behalf of all strugglers for freedom, worthy of a just, generous, and democratic people, knowing that the assumption of such a position on the part of Government will be followed by a ready and hearty response from the citizens of the United States; and that this combination of sympathy for the oppressed cannot but be instrumental in hastening the day when the entire human race shall be delivered from the thralldom of monarchy and despotism.

In behalf of the Industrial Congress:

H. A. GUILD, Secretary.

Mr. DAWSON presented the petition of W. R. Nevins, praying an extension of his patent for a machine for rolling and cutting crackers and biscuits; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Daniel Brister and others, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by the Camanches and other Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of Charles Massey, jr., and other citizens of Philadelphia, praying indemnity for French spoiliations prior to 1800; which was referred to the select committee on French Spoiliations.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying an appropriation for the erection of a breakwater in Owl's Head harbor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Z. F. Johnston, an officer in the Navy, praying the reimbursement of certain expenses to which he was subjected in obeying an order of the Secretary of the Navy, and to be allowed the pay of a Captain in the Navy during the time he discharged the duties of that office; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. CLEMENS, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas Rhodes, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That John C. Sheldon have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That Albert Fitz have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mira M. Alexander, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1851.

NEW SERIES...No. 9.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Thos. H. Leggett.

Mr. SEBASTIAN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to commute the payment of certain Choctaw annuities.

REPORT FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. MANGUM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the personal representatives of William A. Slacum, deceased, reported it without amendment.

BINDING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BORLAND. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution of the House providing for the binding of certain documents, to report the resolution without amendment, and to recommend its adoption by the Senate. I ask that the resolution may be read, as then I have a remark or two to make upon it.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution has not come up for action.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I move that the resolution be taken up now.

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent. If there be no objection the resolution will be taken up.

The joint resolution was then read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that all the Executive documents of which additional copies have been ordered to be printed, which shall not contain less than two hundred and fifty pages, shall be bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, provided the cost thereof shall not exceed 12½ cents per volume.

Mr. BORLAND. Before proceeding with the remarks which I have to offer, I desire to submit an amendment, which is necessary, in order to give the effect intended, to the resolution as it came from the House. The amendment is to insert the word "of," after the word "that" in the first line.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. BORLAND. I am opposed to the resolution, and I will briefly state the reasons of my opposition. This resolution proposes to adopt the same course with regard to binding public documents, that was adopted last session. And I ask the attention of Senators to this matter, because it is one especially affecting their convenience, as well as the interests of the country, so far as the printing and binding of the documents are concerned. At the last session a resolution was adopted by which it was agreed to bind all the public documents of a certain size. At that time it was supposed that this course would greatly increase the value of the documents by enabling us to keep them in better preservation. The practical working of that resolution, however, was the very reverse of what was intended by the adoption of it. So far from facilitating the work, and so far from rendering the documents more valuable by placing them in a better condition for preservation, the reverse of this was the case. And one of the principal causes of the long delay which we experienced in obtaining these documents was, that the binding required considerable additional time. As a consequence of this, we have not yet received all the documents which were ordered last session of Congress.

There is another ground of opposition, to which I desire to refer. This proposition for binding the documents opened another door for additional imposition upon the Senate and the country by providing another case of failure to comply with the terms of the contract. We all well know the inferior character of the work which was done under contract during the last two or three years in the way of printing. That was bad enough. We had submitted to imposition enough, and difficulty enough, in getting the documents printed; and when we agreed to have them bound we opened a door—I will not say to fraud, for I make no such charge against any parties—but at all events, we opened such a door as let in upon us, if not invited, culpable disregard of the terms and conditions of the contract. The binding was greatly inferior to the kind stipulated for, and it proved impracticable to hold the contractors to their contract.

In justification of myself, I feel bound to state a fact in this connection. Under that contract, which seemed as stringent as it was possible to make it, so far at least as words and obligations could go, I, as chairman of the Committee on Printing, had to examine and pass upon these documents when they were brought in by the contractor. The work at first was nearly up to the contract, and the committee agreed to receive it notwithstanding it was a little below the quality stipulated for.

But the next batch of documents was so badly printed, and especially so badly bound, that, as chairman of the committee, I considered it my duty to reject them. The committee at first sustained me in the course I pursued; but notwithstanding this decision, those having the work to do, persevered in doing it in the manner I have mentioned. Documents were piled up in the document rooms, appeals were made to the members of the committee, and others of the Senate and House, and my rejection, at first sustained, was overruled, and thus we were imposed upon by this inferior work. Under the joint resolution under which the committee was formed, and the subsequent resolution for binding, made it my duty to make this examination, &c., of these documents, and the binding. That I performed that duty faithfully, I believe no one will question; and yet, under the operation of the persuasion of the contractor, my decisions were overruled and the contract was thus trampled under foot. I believe, sir, most decidedly, that such a system of contracting as that of which we have already had experience, will result in nothing better than putting money into the hands of speculators; that inferior work will be done, and that the Senate and the country will thus be imposed upon. Money will be taken out of the Treasury which will not go to subserve the public interest, and the pockets of speculators will be filled with it. Sir, I am opposed to such a system. We may not, perhaps, get clear of the whole of the evil, because we must have printing done; but here, I think, is a door which has been opened to imposition, and which I think may now be effectually closed, and with great advantage to the public. At any rate I, for one, cannot agree to a proposition of this sort, because I feel fully convinced that we will not get the work done without great delay and greater imposition. As chairman of the committee I am unwilling to perform this duty, because I know quite well in advance what will be the consequences. I know that I will not be sustained in my duty; and so far as the committee is concerned it will avail nothing to protect the Treasury and the public.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur in many of the suggestions which have fallen from the chairman of the Committee on Printing; yet as to the propriety of adopting the resolution which the House has sent to us, I do not agree at all with him. I am inclined to think, while we print extraordinary numbers of the President's message, and the Patent Office reports, and various other reports from different Departments of the Government, containing valuable and useful information to the country, that it is desirable to preserve them, and put them in a state of preservation for distribution throughout the country. It is very true, I believe, that in but few if any instances where contracts have been made by Congress, have the contractors been made to comply strictly with their contracts. Indeed, I know of none that have been literally complied with. I think, however, if Senators will take the trouble to examine the matter, they will find that these binders have better complied with their contract than almost any other contractors with Congress. I know of no contractors who have fulfilled their contracts so faithfully as these binders have done. And, sir, let me say further, that there are some extenuating circumstances in relation to this matter, to the benefit of which these contractors are entitled. The large editions of documents which are published go to the binders in a state which precludes and absolutely prevents the binding of the documents in that manner in which they would be bound if the sheets were dry and in a different state of preparation when they go to be bound. If a document is bound while the sheets are yet moist, it will after binding shrink, and it cannot be so well bound as it can be if it be allowed to lie till the sheets are dry. Hence the distinction between this and ordinary binding. But if Senators will look at the documents which have been bound, and particularly that mass to which allusion has been made, I think they will be found to be of a good quality. It should be borne in mind that the sum which we pay for the binding of all these documents is but twelve and a half cents per volume. It is a matter in which, individually, I feel no particular interest; but still I am decidedly of opinion that while we publish large editions of the various works to which I have alluded, it is desirable that we should put them into a state in which they may be preserved, and for that reason I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. MANGUM. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until Monday next. It is interfering with and cutting off the morning business.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no objection to the postponement of it. I would be glad to have it postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it go over until Monday.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that will not be done, for I shall not be here on Monday next, and I should like to be present when the resolution is again considered.

Mr. MANGUM. Well, then, say Monday week.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; Monday week. That will do.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MANGUM to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution until Monday week; and it was decided in the affirmative.

MONARCHICAL versus CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to take up the resolutions which I had the honor of introducing the other day, with the view of moving that they be printed. I refer to the resolutions of inquiry addressed to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in reference to our foreign policy. I make this motion, because I discover that there is some misapprehension existing, not only in the minds of Senators, but also in the public mind, in reference to what these resolutions are. In one of the papers published in this city, the Union—towards which I entertain the most cordial feeling, as well as towards the publishers of that paper, and I am very confident that they do not feel otherwise towards myself—I find this statement:

"Mr. Walker introduced a resolution declaring it the true policy of the United States to 'intervene against intervention' in the cause of Hungary."

I have also been inquired of by Senators, and indeed by several others, whether my resolutions were absolute, and declaratory of the policy of the United States, or whether they were merely resolutions of inquiry. The resolutions themselves having relation to a very important subject, and finding this misapprehension prevailing regarding them, I desire that they may be printed, in order that there may no longer be any misapprehension about them, and that their phraseology may be submitted to the most careful examination and scrutiny.

The motion to take up the resolutions was agreed to, and they were then ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BOUNTY LANDS.

The PRESIDENT. There is a joint resolution upon the table in relation to the act granting bounty lands to soldiers who have been engaged in the service of the United States. It will now be read a second time.

The resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the resolution open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is open to amendment, unless it be referred.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This whole subject is now under the consideration of the Committee on Public Lands. I have been instructed to hold a conference with the Commissioner of Public Lands, and expect to report on Monday or Tuesday next. I think, therefore, it would be better to let this resolution lie over until the committee who have this bill under consideration make their report; and when it is made it will most probably be matured in such a way as to make the whole matter satisfactory. I therefore think it advisable to postpone the subject for the present.

Mr. BORLAND. I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky; but I have an amendment which I wish to propose to the bill when it comes up for consideration, and which I wish to be referred to the committee with the other papers.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Be it further resolved, That in all cases where the militia, or volunteers, or State troops, were called out under the requisition of the Secretary of War, or of any officer of the United States Army duly authorized, and whose services have been recognized and paid by the United States, shall be considered as having been in the service of the United States, and shall be entitled to the benefit of the act of which those resolutions are explanatory.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] and that is, that this bill passed the Committee on Public Lands in both branches of Congress last session, but by some means or other it failed between the two Houses. I believe it has also passed the Committee on Public Lands this session.

The PRESIDENT. No, it was introduced on leave.

Mr. SHIELDS. Well, it is the same bill which passed the committees of both Houses last session, but failed by some means which I cannot explain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to state to my friend from Illinois that the Committee on Public Lands have an amendment under consideration, which it is of some consequence to be matured, and which will probably be done next week. That amendment is to make the locations which have taken place on land warrants assignable as well as the warrants themselves. There are, also, some other amendments in contemplation; and I have some information, derived from the Commissioner of Public Lands, which I propose laying before the Committee. Now, although this resolution in substance passed during the last session of Congress, it did not make provision on this new subject I have mentioned, and therefore I think it would be better to refer this resolution to the Committee on Public Lands, that have the subject under consideration, and let that committee review the whole subject and report early upon it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky make that motion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the consent of the Senator from Illinois I will move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The question being taken on the motion to refer, it was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I now move that my amendment be printed.

The motion to print the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. There is an amendment which I wish to offer. It is a proviso to the first resolution; and as the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas has been ordered to be printed, I move that my amendment be printed also.

The amendment is as follows:

Provided, That not more than two land warrants, of one hundred and sixty acres each, or their equivalent in warrants of less denominations, shall be located by or in the name of the same individual upon any of the public lands.

The motion to print the amendment was agreed to.

THE EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

The joint resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates, came up in its order, and was read the second time, and then passed over.

THE LIBERATION OF ABD EL KADER.

The joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to interpose the friendly offices of this Government with the President of the Republic of France in behalf of the liberation of Abd el Kader, came up in its order, was read the second time, and was then passed over.

PRINTING OF THE JOURNAL, &c.

The resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journal and public documents, was read a third time and passed.

CLAIM FOR COMPENSATION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a matter to bring before the Senate for which I have a precedent in the case of Mrs. Worth. Mrs. Alexander, of Kentucky, is the only daughter of George Madison, late Governor of Kentucky. She represents that her father, being captured and taken prisoner and being carried to Quebec, never received compensation, and no provision was made for his family. I move that the papers be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, so that this lady may be put upon the same footing as other ladies, being the representative of a distinguished man, who, it is said, lost his life by disease contracted in the service of his country.

The PRESIDENT. Has any report been made in this case?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe that a favorable report has been made, but I am not quite certain.

Leave was given to withdraw the papers, and they were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolution submitted by Mr. Foote, declaring the compromise measures a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the subject of slavery.

A debate ensued, to which Mr. RHETT and Mr. FOOTE were the parties, which occupied the Senate until near the usual hour of adjournment. And for which see Appendix.

Mr. HOUSTON then rose and said, that as the day was so far advanced he should prefer to take an earlier portion of the day on Monday, if it met with the approval of the Senate.

The suggestion was assented to, and on motion the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and,

The Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, December 22, 1851.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the proceedings and a memorial of the Railroad Convention of the State of Iowa, in favor of the enactment of a law granting the right of way and making a grant of land to that State, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to Keokuck, and from Davenport to the Missouri river, at or near Council Bluffs, in Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the memorial of Mary Robb, widow of Hugh Robb, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of S. Hempstead and others, praying that a pension may be granted to David L. Davis, in consideration of an injury received while in the service of the United States as an assistant surveyor of public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted additional documents in relation to the petition of Nathan Weston, jr.; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of Thomas Mullett, praying compensation for his services as a deputy surveyor of public lands in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Also, the petition of W. C. Templeton, proposing to establish a line of mail steamers from New Orleans, via Tampico, to Vera Cruz, and praying that the Postmaster General may be directed to enter into contract with him for the transportation of the mail between those places; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of John Ireland, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

STEAMSHIP PROMETHEUS.

On motion by Mr. CASS, it was Ordered, That the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the firing into and seizure of the American steamship Prometheus, by a British vessel of war, transmitted to the Senate the 17th instant, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MESSRS. FOSTER AND WHITNEY'S REPORT.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That of the additional number of copies of the report of Messrs. Foster and Whitney, ordered to be printed by the resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, five hundred be furnished to the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be authorized to employ a clerk during the present session, who shall receive the usual compensation.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD, according to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution for the relief of Alexander P. Field, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, and sureties; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MANGUM, according to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of John R. Bryan, administrator of Isaac Garretson, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and, with the papers on the files of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad in said State, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Arnold, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. MILLER. Pursuant to a notice which I gave on Saturday last, I ask leave to introduce a bill making appropriation for improvements in certain rivers and harbors.

In presenting this bill to the Senate, I desire merely to say, that it is the same bill as that which passed the House at the last session of Congress, but which was defeated in this body on the last night of the session, for want of time to bring it to a final vote.

It has been the habit of both branches of Congress to delay action upon measures of this kind until towards the close of the session, when it is impossible to give to them that attention which their importance demands.

My object in introducing this important measure to the attention of the Senate at so early a day, is to give ample time for its consideration, and thereby save it from the catastrophe which defeated it at the last session. I hope that the subject may receive the early attention of the Committee on Commerce, to which I move its reference.

Leave being granted to introduce the bill, it was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up a resolution which was laid upon the table some days ago, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for some information in regard to the practice of flogging in the Navy.

The motion to take up the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move to amend the resolution, by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting what I now send to the Chair.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate whether any charges were preferred by any officer of the United States frigate Cumberland against William K. Latimer, while commanding said frigate on her recent cruise, for illegal punishment and disobedience of orders; and also, whether any court of inquiry was held on the conduct of said Latimer, and if so, what was the finding or recommendation of said court of inquiry; and if any such charges have been made against said Latimer, or if any such court of inquiry has been held, that he furnish the same to the Senate; and that he also inform the Senate what proceeding the Secretary of the Navy has taken in the premises, both as regards said Latimer and the officer who preferred said charges.

Mr. DAWSON. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, whether it would not be better to alter his amendment so as to call upon the President for this information. I believe it is not usual to call upon the Heads of Departments directly for any information; but through the medium of the President. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "Secretary of the Navy" and inserting the words the "President of the United States." I believe this is the usual course.

Mr. HALE. I am not positively certain what the practice is; but I understand that it is both ways.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia propose to amend in the way he has suggested?

Mr. DAWSON. I have no particular wish to interfere with the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. My only object was to observe a conformity to what I believed to be the usual custom.

The PRESIDENT. Sometimes calls for information are made upon the Heads of Departments, and at others upon the President. I believe there is no fixed custom upon the subject.

Mr. DAWSON. Well, it is immaterial, and I will withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. HALE, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative.

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Maryland will now be taken up for consideration.

The resolution provides, that from and after the first of January next, Fridays of each week shall be set apart for the consideration of private claims, and that on these days private bills shall have priority over all other business.

Mr. DAVIS, (in his seat.) I hope that resolution will not pass.

Mr. PRATT. I did not suppose that this resolution would have met with opposition on the part of any member of this body; but I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say, in an under tone of voice, that he hoped this resolution would not pass. I was a member of the Committee of Claims during the last session of Congress, and I have the honor of being upon the same committee now. During the last session there were more than a hundred claims favorably reported upon by the committee, and yet not one of them was acted upon by the Senate. During the same session, there were more than one hundred claims which were reported upon unfavorably, and all of these latter mentioned reports were immediately sanctioned by the Senate. Anterior to the last Congress I believe that two days in each week were assigned for the consideration of private claims. I have been instructed by the committee to ask the Senate to pass this resolution. I hope it will be adopted; for one thing is certain, and that is, that that committee design to ask the Senate to abolish it as one of the standing committees of this body, unless their action is to receive some attention on the part of the Senate. Let me ask why this committee is to be engaged session after session in investigating private claims, if gentlemen are to express the hope (no doubt expecting that by the mere expression of the hope it will be realized) that such a resolution as that will not pass?

Mr. President, unless the Senate agree to fix some particular day in each week for the consideration of these claims, they will not be considered at all. The experience of the whole of the last Congress shows this to be true. It is clear that you are doing injustice to this committee of the Senate by imposing upon them this labor without considering what they have done. Mr. President, I repeat that I am instructed by this committee to ask for the passage of this resolution by the Senate; and it may be as well to say, that if the Senate will not consent to give some little attention to what we do, we do not intend to do anything more but to ask the Senate to abolish the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. It is very true, Mr. President, that I did express a hope that this resolution would not pass, and I did so because I believe that by adopting it, we are not going either to save the time of the Senate or to facilitate the dispatch of business. I do not know how it should happen in the course of a session of three months, when every bill goes upon the calendar, private as well as public, that we should not reach these private bills. But then I take it as the result of another disorderly practice which we have adopted here—and I trust the Senate will excuse the use of that word, for I do not use it disrespectfully—I refer to the system of making special assignments of business from day to day, and from time to time, and from hour to hour. Now, to say the least, I think that this is an erroneous practice; that it creates confusion; that it does not hasten the progress of business at all; while, on the contrary, I believe that if we would permit the business to go on in the order in which it stands on the calendar, we should accomplish much more than we do, and do it more to our satisfaction. I have no objection to the assignment of a day or days for the consideration of these private claims, if the honorable Senator and his committee desire it; but instead of selecting certain days of the week for that purpose, I would select those seasons and times when the public business does not press upon us; and in such seasons and times I would assign certain days for taking up these bills and for the action of the Senate upon them.

There is another reason why I would prefer this course—a reason in the force of which I think all gentlemen here of any experience will agree—and that is, that if you assign Fridays and Saturdays to private bills, you will seldom have a quorum in this body. Gentlemen will abandon the Senate. That is the experience of the past, and if you adopt this rule again you will very often find yourselves in that condition. Those gentlemen only who happen to feel an interest in private claims, will come here just for the purpose of having those claims in which they are particularly interested brought to an issue. Other gentlemen will say, "I have no particular interest in this business; I can employ my time in a manner which will be much more agreeable to me, and I will leave the Senate."

If any change is to be made in the mode of doing business, I believe it would be better to take the business as it stands upon the calendar, and lessen the number and frequency of special appointments—the assignment of particular days for particular things if you please, and take them in the order in which they stand on the docket. I by no means wish to throw any obstruction in the way of private bills, but desire that they may go through the Senate in the ordinary way. If I differ with the gentleman, it is merely as to which is the best way of doing this business, he appearing to suppose that we can accomplish it best by the adoption of one mode, while I think we can do it best by the adoption of another.

Mr. PRATT. I do not know that I precisely comprehend the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but if I do understand it, it is this: That the claims of the citizens of this country against the Government for money due them do not come under his category of "public business;" that it is not a kind of business which demands the action of Congress—

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me, I beg to say that I did not make any such assertion as that. Not at all. I merely wished that a discrimination should be made here between a certain class of bills known as private bills, and a certain other class called public bills. That was all I intended.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator from Massachusetts does not make in terms, the assertion or the argument which I attributed to him; but in reality he does so. What is it that he asks? He says that he has no objection that some days should be fixed for the consideration of private claims, but he wants such days fixed as will not interfere with public business. Although, therefore, in so many words the Senator does not assert what I stated, yet in substance he certainly did so. All these claims are to be superseded if there be anything for the consideration of the Senate which is called "public business." I apprehend that there is not a single claim which has been passed upon by that committee which was not investigated most rigidly and patiently; and I am satisfied that none of them were favorably reported upon which ought not at once to have passed. On the contrary, I know, both as a member of this body and as a member of that committee, that not one of these claims has been passed upon by the Senate. Where the Government is indebted to citizens it is the duty of Congress, which I believe the Senator from Massachusetts will not in the abstract deny, to pay those citizens, rather than to attend to resolutions and discussions which the gentleman may consider as public business, especially such business as we have been engaged in since the commencement of this session. I hold that we should have been much more profitably engaged if, instead of discussing the abstract propositions which have thus far engaged our attention, we had been engaged in doing justice to citizens who have claims against the Government—if we had been engaged in paying our honest debts. Yes, sir, this would have been much better than devoting our attention to people who have no particular claim upon us.

I hope, then, that this resolution will be passed. It is due to those claimants that it should be passed, and to refuse to pass it is to do injustice. There are claims here which have been standing for the last ten years, which have been favorably reported upon, and which certainly ought to be passed. That the Government owes the money there can be no doubt. That money has never been paid; and I hold it to be the duty of this body to fix some day for that purpose. To this end I have offered this resolution, so as to see whether we can prevail upon Senators to pay the just claims of their fellow-citizens upon the Government, and to attend to the reports of their committee.

Mr. MANGUM. After a long course of observation I am satisfied that any departure from the ancient rules of the Senate in this respect will tend to obstruct rather than to facilitate the course of business. If this body will do what it did some years ago—pertinaciously adhere to the calendar, we shall get through the whole business satisfactorily and accurately. But, sir, there is a struggle here towards the close of the session, and very often at the early part of it, to get precedence to take up particular claims in which individual Senators feel an interest, to the prejudice of all others. If the Senate will adhere to the ancient rule, and suffer nothing to be taken up out of its order, unless it be in a case of great emergency, we shall accomplish all in due season. I am opposed to the passage of this resolution. I have seen this thing attempted at least twenty times, with very indifferent effect as to the progress of business, besides the risk of injustice sometimes being done to the Treasury by the minority. On the other hand, if everything comes up in its due order, everything will be done satisfactorily to the country and to this body. I hope, therefore, that this resolution will not pass. I am perfectly satisfied that all the business of the Senate can be done, and well done, if the Senate will adhere to its ancient rule and take up all business in its order. Under such a rule, public and private business shares an equal fate.

Mr. ATCHISON. I concur with the Senator from North Carolina in one point of view. If we do adhere to the calendar all these difficulties will be obviated. But the Senator knows as well as any gentleman here that we do not do it—that the Senate never has done it—

Mr. MANGUM, (in his seat.) Yes it has.

Mr. ATCHISON. And they never will do it.

Mr. MANGUM. Oh, yes they will.

Mr. ATCHISON. There were three abstract resolutions introduced at an early period of this session, out of which no earthly good can possibly grow. These resolutions have been discussed day after day, and that, too, against the ancient usages of the Senate, on Fridays and Saturdays, and, sir, from one o'clock till four o'clock on each day. There is the Kossuth resolution, and the Compromise resolution, and the O'Brien resolution yet to come up—

Mr. DAWSON. And the Abd el Kader resolution.

Mr. ATCHISON. All abstract resolutions, that have had precedence of all other matters; and they are made the special orders of the day, from day to day, until the final vote is taken upon them, for they are sometimes taken up even in the morning hour, and the discussion of these questions runs through the whole day.

Now, sir, let me mention another matter. Here we have been sitting on Fridays and Saturdays, at this early period of the session, for the discussion of these abstract resolutions. This custom of sitting on these two last days of the week is never adopted at the commencement of a session, but usually towards the close of it, and such has been the practice ever since I was a member of this body. Thus far, Fridays and Saturdays have been employed in debating these questions, and—

Mr. PRATT, (in his seat.) And all those claims which have been favorably reported upon remain untouched.

Mr. ATCHISON. Just so; not one of them acted upon; not a single claim from any committee disposed of. Now let us pass this resolution and fix these days, and these claims will soon be disposed of. They will be settled in one way or another, and the calendar and the committee room will not be burdened with them. Sir, I know of matters which have occupied the attention of some of the committees for four or five months, which have been reported by these committees, and yet to which the Senate has never bestowed even five minutes' consideration. With a resolution similar to the one offered by the Senator from Maryland this could never be the case.

Mr. HUNTER. I concur in what has been said by the Senators from Massachusetts and North Carolina in relation to this rule. I believe that the claimants would be worse off after the adoption of this rule than they are now. I have witnessed the operation of a similar rule in the House of Representatives, and the effect will be that whenever we have a matter of public importance to discuss, we shall set aside the rule, and set aside private bills on the days appropriated to them, and we shall go on with the business just as we do now. The effect will be that they will lose the day set aside for them, and they will never be taken up on any other day. On the other hand, if we adhere to the calendar, we shall reach these bills in their order, and settle questions appertaining to them quicker and better than can be done by an alteration of the rule.

There is much in another point which was urged by the Senator from Massachusetts, namely, that if we set aside these days for these claims, we shall hardly ever have a quorum. Not only that, but it is the custom of the Senate to adjourn on these days during the first months of the session. Private bills will therefore lose that attention which they might otherwise get during the early portion of the session. For these reasons, I am of opinion that private claimants will be much worse off by the adoption of this rule than by adhering to the course we now pursue.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall vote in favor of this resolution, for two or three reasons, which I will state to the Senate. I do not concur in what appears to be the recollection of the Senator from Virginia in regard to the operation of this rule in the other House. Without that rule I am quite satisfied that no private claimant would have got a hearing at all; and the only hearing which they had there was in virtue of that rule. If we could adopt the course suggested by the Senators from Massachusetts and North Carolina, I would most cheerfully cooperate with them. But the practice of the Senate shows that we cannot adhere to our own rules. Sir, what is on your table at this present moment? Four special orders—one of which, as has been well remarked by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. ATCHISON,] is not only useless, but worse than useless—which have overridden the rules of the Senate. There is a practical commentary on adhering to the rules as suggested by the Senators from Massachusetts and North Carolina.

Again, sir, there is another reason, which I think will commend itself to the sense of the Senate. There were a few private claims which received the favorable action of the Senate last session. But how was it accomplished? By a struggle on this floor, and an attempt to obtain action upon any particular bill, to the exclusion of other business in which other Senators might feel an interest; and hence there was produced a collision between Senators, and a struggle for the floor, to take out of the ordinary course of business the few bills which did get through. Besides that, I have not forgotten, and Senators will not perhaps forget, that I stood in my place here till I was almost exhausted, attempting to keep the order of the calendar. And what was the result? Simply that a little band of us round here were disposed to adhere to the business as it stood upon the calendar, and take it up in that order. "Special orders" on "special orders," were piled upon your table, and the ordinary course of business was not pursued, and the Senate refused, time after time, to take up the business on the calendar. Now, what has been the practice for the last five or six years, we may anticipate will be the continued action of the Senate, when we look at the fact that you have now at this early period of the session four special orders on your table, not one of which is a private claim. Sir, I think we should adopt this rule. There is an obligation on the part of the Senate, to examine and pass upon these claims; and entertaining that opinion, I indorse every word which has fallen from the Senator from Maryland. There is an obligation upon us, that the Government should discharge its indebtedness, because in many instances, this delay works the most cruel injustice. True it is, that some of these claims are what may be said to be entirely of a disputed character; but whatever they may be, let us at least vote upon them after the committees have made their examinations and reported to the Senate.

Mr. MANGUM. Every gentleman, with only one exception, who has spoken upon this subject, admits the soundness and propriety of the rule of proceeding according to the calendar; and all the arguments which have been offered in favor of this resolution, proceed upon the presumption that the Senate will fail to do its duty. Now, I will not be so discourteous to the Senators to act upon any such assumption. I hope, sir, that while the Senate is well convinced of the propriety of taking up the calendar in its order, they will adopt an additional rule, that no business shall be taken up out of its course, without a vote of two thirds of this body.

A SENATOR. No, no.

Mr. MANGUM. A majority regulates the business, and that is as it should be; and if a rule requiring a two-thirds vote should be adopted, the business would go on smoothly and properly; and, in any case of emergency, that number could be obtained to set aside the rule for the time being.

Sir, I am perfectly satisfied, from long observation of the course of business here, that if private claimants are to have their business pass through this body with any certainty, it can only be done by adhering to the rules of the Senate. If that is done, all will be accomplished in due season. I admit that I have witnessed what I would hardly regard as strict decorum in this body, when gentlemen were pressing claims; but, if a majority will turn their faces against this thing, and remain steady and firm, there will be no difficulty at all. I repeat, sir, that all the arguments which have been urged in favor of the adoption of this resolution, have been based on the assumption that this body is not to be trusted in the true and proper discharge of its duty; and I think that Senators, by their votes, will hardly give countenance to such an assumption.

Mr. DOWNS. I feel it my duty, as a member of two committees engaged in the business of the Senate—the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Private Land Claims—to express my entire concurrence in what has been said by the Senator from Maryland; and unless this resolution is adopted I shall consider it as amounting almost to a determination of the Senate not to dispose of these claims. We had formerly a rule of this kind, though it was sometimes dispensed with on particular occasions; but I recollect that when this rule was in force we disposed of much more business of this kind than we have done without it. The Senator from North Carolina seems to admit that with the present system some additional rules are necessary; that we should take up bills according to their order upon the calendar. We were told over and over again last session that this was the proper course, and we tried to pursue it, but were defeated in all our attempts. On many occasions the Senate refused to take up bills, on the ground that it was proper that they should come up in their regular order; and you, Mr. President, can bear witness that we did not for a single day adhere to that rule. And, sir, if we adopt it again we will not adhere to it now. I feel satisfied that we will not. There are many inconveniences which would be experienced with such a rule. It would be inconvenient that we should so cramp ourselves by rule or practice as to take nothing up which might not happen to be in the regular order of the calendar. Sir, emergencies might arise when it would be necessary to travel out of the usual order—emergencies which are common to all legislative bodies. We may have indulged in this practice of taking up bills out of their order too much; we may have carried it too far; but we have pursued it so long that I do not think that we shall depart from it now; and therefore, Mr. President, I hope that this rule will be adopted. Let us try it for a while at any rate. Matters in respect to these private claims cannot be worse, with this rule, than they were last session, for we then got nothing; and if we can do nothing with this rule, let us try some other. I am unwilling to admit that the Senate has got into such a habit that Senators will not attend to the duties for which they are sent here. It is especially incumbent upon the Senate to proceed in this matter now, especially since we all know that the last session of Congress passed off without anything being done in this large and important part of the business of Congress. The course we have pursued in regard to these claims has furnished more real cause of complaint than perhaps any other. We cannot force the Government to do anything, but we may at least be permitted to ask for justice. I hope, sir, that this resolution will pass.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair may be permitted to state, in consequence of a remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts, in which he alluded to what he considered a "disorderly" practice, that the practice of making special orders could not be considered disorderly, inasmuch as it was the wish and decision of the Senate. The remark, too, would seem to convey the idea that the Chair had indulged Senators in "disorderly practices." The practice of making special orders may be a very inconvenient one, but it cannot sustain the designation which has been given to it. The Chair feels called upon to make this statement. The practice being the action of the Senate itself, it cannot with propriety be designated as disorderly.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and there were for the motion 21; against it 19.

So the resolution was adopted.

PRINTING THE SEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. BRIGHT. There is upon the table a special order for this morning of which I hope the Senate will dispose. I allude to the resolution in relation to the printing the returns of the Seventh Census.

The PRESIDENT. Another special order has the priority, upon which the Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the resolution to which I refer may be acted upon, with the consent of the Senator from Texas. I believe it will occupy but a brief period, after which the Senator may proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am disposed to yield for twenty minutes, if the resolution can be disposed of in that time.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the Senate will not take up that resolution. I shall have occasion to move an amendment to it.

Several SENATORS. Offer it now.

Mr. SMITH. I have not yet prepared it. I knew there was another special order before that resolution, and therefore I did not come prepared to offer my amendment. I repeat the expression of my wish that the Senate will not agree to the motion of the Senator from Indiana. It will occupy considerable time in its consideration when it shall come up.

Mr. BRIGHT. If it will lead to discussion I am bound not to press it, but I give notice that I shall to-morrow, and each succeeding day thereafter, press it upon the attention of the Senate until it is disposed of, and I hope the Senator from Connecticut will come prepared with his amendment.

The motion was then withdrawn.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the special order, being the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE, as amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER, declaring the compromise measures a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the subject of slavery.

The resolution is as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it enacted, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplement to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, for several days past I have hoped this resolution could be disposed of. I have evinced but little anxiety to participate in this debate, though I have thought much in relation to the disposition which is to be made of the resolution which is now before us. I must confess that it was a matter of astonishment when I first met with it in this body. I had expected nothing of the kind. The general aspect of affairs throughout the country seemed to be of the most favorable character towards the harmonious adjustment of the difficulties which have excited the community, and I had hoped that they would have been permitted to have taken their natural course, and that the good sense of the American people would have regulated these matters, without the interposition of any deliberative or legislative body. The contrary, however, has been the case, and it devolves upon me as a member, not only of this body, but of the Democratic party, to declare my objections to it.

I may say that I occupy no equivocal position in relation to the matter of the compromise, for I believe the records of the Senate will prove that I am the only Senator now upon this floor that voted for every measure of the compromise. An honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] also voted for all the provisions of the compromise, but he is no longer a member of this body. This being my position, I feel at liberty to acquit myself of all embarrassment, and to proceed to the investigation of this subject, I hope, without incurring the suspicion of any design to conceal or smooth over any portion of my conduct. I desire, sir, to have no broader platforms than those now existing and maintained by the two parties of this country. I understand that the Democratic party is tolerant in its principles; that they are not proscriptive; that they are not for applying the Procrustean rule to every member of the party. Harmonious as they generally are, some gentlemen of the same party differ essentially upon the subject of internal improvements. That has been evinced on former occasions here, within my recollection, and I believe it extends much further back than my familiarity with the proceedings of this body. And not only that, for I have heard discussions here by the members of the same political party on the tariff, in regard to which there was a wide difference of opinion; yet it was not a ground for proscribing the members of the party, or excluding them from participating in all the rights pertaining to it.

This being my view of the principles of the party, I am perfectly willing that the platform upon which we have heretofore acted should remain as it now is, and has been recognized. If gentlemen have departed from the principles of the Democratic faith, and they choose to return to the same platform, I know no objection to their doing so. They have a right to return at any time they please, and the mere concurrence with a paper resolution, unless they feel it here, [laying his hand upon his heart,] will never constrain them to cooperate with the party in good faith. I have this to say to gentlemen who are tenacious on this subject, "Show me your faith without your works, and I will show you my faith by my works." When this rule is applied I can see no difficulty in the way of concurrence of opinion and action in the Democratic party. Moreover I object most especially to the action of this body upon the subject of political platforms. I understand that the business of the Senate of the United States—at least I so regard my own duty—is legislative employment, and not to construct political party fabrics for the people. I would defer to the pressure from without, but I should not expect to benefit the community by radiating from this point, influences of opinions that savor too much of centralism. Centralism is the danger against which the States have to guard; and if our legislation has this tendency, as has been complained of—I do not say it has—but if such dangers are to be apprehended from legislative action, are they not much more to be dreaded by converting the Senate of the United States into a political machine? I never will agree to this, sir. I will never exercise a function in this body that is not clearly delegated by the relation which I bear to my constituency, and for which I was sent here.

It is a principle which is orthodox, and essential to the Democratic party, that the citizen, in a republic, is to delegate no power that he can conveniently exercise himself; and the powers which he cannot conveniently exercise he delegates to his representative, who is to perform the functions for him. If I am correct in this, whenever the powers delegated are diverted from the objects to which they ought to be directed, it is an application of them which is foreign to the rights of the people; and therefore I will never exercise any power, which I may have in this body, towards creating sentiment at home, when I ought, in justice, to derive that sentiment from my constituency. We have seen the effect of it in days gone by. I do not say it for the purpose of awakening any feelings or reminiscences that would be unpleasant, but is it not within the recollection of members of this body, that opinions which were sent from here to the several States throughout the South, had a powerful influence in producing the excitement which existed in the country? I was opposed to all this, because I deemed that the people throughout this Union were sufficiently intelligent to appreciate their true condition, and that if there was a necessity for correcting evils that might grow up in the country, they would have an ample opportunity, at the ballot-box, for exercising their powers in correcting them. These are my opinions in relation to this matter. If the Democratic platform and the Whig platform are not broad enough for all to occupy, let the people put on any additional plank which they deem needful. We know not but that we, by enlarging, may induce an accession too great for the platform to bear, and it may break asunder.

Resolutions similar to the one under consideration were introduced into a caucus of the Democratic members of the other House, and met with little favor there; some fifty to thirty rejected it. It was not introduced into a caucus of Senators, or I presume it would have met with as little favor. But it has found its way into this body; for what purpose? For the purpose of benefiting a party that was acting, I believe, harmoniously. Some differences of opinion existed, as is always the case, and always will be; but how easy would it have been within a short time for all these asperities of feeling to have worn out, and enabled the members of each party to act harmoniously.

Mr. FOOTE. Does the Senator intend to intimate that I had any party purpose in view in introducing this resolution?

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot believe that the Senator had, and would be sorry to believe that there was any individual purpose in it. But certainly it was not an emanation of party, and the gentleman has the privilege of disposing of it in a manner suitable to himself.

Mr. FOOTE. I did not introduce it as a party man.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have witnessed with concern the proceedings of this body for some days past. I have been silent, for if no older person than myself were present, there were Senators here who are more familiar with the proceedings of the body than I am, and to them I deferred the duty and privilege of regulating the conduct of Senators, if it was not in accordance with the practice of the body, and I looked moreover to an enlightened President. For myself, having occupied no great portion of the time of this body, I shall claim the privilege of proceeding without interruption, unless for the purpose of correction of some misstatement which I may make in the progress of my speech. My disposition is never to provoke interruption or produce annoyance to honorable members of this body, and I cannot suspect that any one would have the design of annoying me; but every Senator must be aware that such things must be unpleasant, if not discourteous.

I should think, Mr. President, according to the rule which I have laid down, that if we were to pass resolutions in this body, or if joint resolutions were passed by Congress, prescribing the faith of either party, or what their principles should be, that every one who did not come within the exact measure prescribed would be reproachfully treated, or at least arrayed at the tribunal of party, not where he would have a hearing, because he would be excluded. He would not have the privilege of a hearing. Sir, I am for leaving to every gentleman's own conscience, and to the high motive of love of country and patriotism, to determine with which party he will act, and how far he will act with it. If the representative of a party is brought forward and that representative is sustained, though not agreeing in opinion with all of those who elected him, I should say that he was entitled to its consideration, and that he should be received by the members of that party, because as long as a man remains within it he is bound by its general principles.

It is the boast of the Democratic party, I believe, that it is the true conservative party of the country, though, at the same time, it is the boast of every political party. I will not deprive either of them of the agreeable assurance. But, sir, if the Democratic party is truly conservative, I think the platform upon which it now stands is wide enough, broad enough, to embrace the whole Union. If it is not I am not a member of it. I know that I have been arraigned for having been too latitudinous in my feelings; but I must confess that my country seems not too large to love, to cherish, and support. Then, sir, if the object of the party is conservatism, and to preserve what we believe the true constitutional principles of the Government, whoever loves and supports that Constitution strictly, is my fellow. I know how the Constitution was formed. It was by concessions made by the several States, or by grants of certain powers that were to remain in the Federal Government; but these delegated functions were to be exercised by it for the benefit of the whole. So far the Federal Government has rights, but no further. The States were free, sovereign, and independent, until these concessions were made. The Federal Government became the repository of delegated powers, and there they remain for the benefit of the several States. The States, in the full enjoyment of the powers reserved, are independent within their sphere and subject to no control from the Federal Government. These are my opinions, and I believe they agree with the Democratic faith. Incidentally various subjects have arisen in this body since I have been a member of it, and upon all these I have recorded my opinions. I know they have been at variance, on some occasions, with my party, or rather the party with which I act—I will not call it mine; I belong to it. As some of them have been incidentally adverted to, I feel bound to take up more time in some explanatory remarks in regard to my course, than I should otherwise have any disposition to do.

One thing I must be permitted to say. On this compromise, which appears to be again brought into this body, and the several measures of which have produced divisions in the Democratic party, I acted, to be sure, with the majority; but because gentlemen of the same political party differed with me I am not their censor, nor have I any right to judge them beyond the exercise of my own power or to impute to them motives unworthy of Senators. I have never done this; and I claim exemption only from charges of this character.

I had hoped that the agitation on this question was fast dying away; and it might ere this have been forgotten had it not been for the introduction of this unfortunate resolution, which has renewed all the agitation of former times, and produced crimination and recrimination, and scenes not less violent in their character than those exhibited upon the adoption of the compromise itself. It is unfortunate; and if in the inception of a resolution of this kind such are the fruits, and if such they are in a green tree, what must they be in a dry? I apprehend that no earthly good can grow out of the adoption of the resolution. The usurpation of the people's rights will be manifest. If a modification is to take place in the Democratic platform, let it take place in a convention of the delegates of the people sent there for a political purpose, not for the purpose of legislation, but for the formation of certain creeds and impositions of opinions, by which the party is to be regulated in its action. That is where I wish to see such action take place. But further than this I am not prepared to go. I am not disposed to set myself up here to dictate what the peculiar political faith of my constituents shall be, or to unite in saying what the faith and opinion of the whole party throughout the United States shall be. But I am willing to vote in the passage of laws that shall extend throughout the whole Union, and the infractions of which shall incur penalties. I am not competent to perform the former tasks, nor do I think they are designed for me to do.

As the State to which I belong has been alluded to in this body in relation to the compromise measures, I will detain the Senate while I utter a few words on that subject. The compromise, sir, was the work of able, patriotic, and renowned statesmen. Some of them are no longer in this body. It is with regret, Mr. President, that I witness the absence of one who bore an important and a conspicuous part in the accomplishment of that compromise. I allude to the venerable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who is detained from this Chamber by sickness, with which he is deeply afflicted. I trust he will again resume his place in the Senate. The wisdom of his counsels, the brilliancy of his genius, the strength of his will, and the patriotism of his heart, never shown brighter than during their manifestation in this body in the achievement of that compromise. But my State has been arraigned by a portion of this Union, and of the Democratic party, too, for making a disposition of a portion of her territory to the detriment of Southern interests; and that I felt. It was not that she was disposed to abridge or impair any of the rights of the South. Texas, no doubt, had a right to dispose of it. Did not Georgia dispose of her territory to the Federal Government? Did she not sell enough to make the States of Alabama and Mississippi? And have any complaints been made against her for it? And had Texas, who came into this Union as free and independent as Georgia did, no right to dispose of her domain to the Federal Government? She did it, sir; and I have this to remark, that had it been any obstacle to the compromise of the jarring interests of this country, and to their reconciliation, I would have been willing that every foot of the territory which she claimed, should become a lake of fire and brimstone rather than it should have thrown an impediment in the way of the peace and harmony of the Union.

I voted also for the admission of California. I did it upon the acknowledged and avowed principle of the South: "Let us alone; let the people regulate their municipal and domestic institutions; let them alone." And I put it to the candor of honorable Senators from the South, no matter how ardent their feelings may have been, whether, if California had made application for admission into the Union, with a constitution declaring that slavery should exist, they would not have disregarded all the irregularities which may have been connected with it, and readily have voted for her admission as a slave State? The same rule which would induce me to vote for it in one situation, would constrain me to do it in another. I did it. What advantage would have resulted from a delay? Was there any hope for a change of her institutions? Was there any probability of it? No. She came in; and whatever reproaches are attached to the vote I gave, I derive my consolation from the general prosperity and happiness of my country.

Allusion has also been made, I believe, to the vote I gave on the organization of the Oregon Territory, containing the Wilmot proviso. Upon that subject, Mr. President, I feel myself fully sustained. I voted for the Missouri compromise line. Upon the admission or organization of Oregon, that Missouri compromise line was repudiated by the South, and I was the only clearly Southern Senator that voted for that admission. I voted in harmony with the Missouri compromise line. I based my vote upon that ground, and in this Senate, it will be remembered what my declarations and sentiments were. To sustain myself upon that, I will bring forward a portion of a speech which was made at that time. It was by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, no longer on earth, (Mr. Calhoun.) During the debate in relation to the territorial government of Oregon, he said:

"After an arduous struggle of more than a year on the question whether Missouri should come into the Union, with or without restrictions prohibiting slavery, a compromise line was adopted between the North and the South; but it was done under circumstances which made it no wise obligatory on the latter. It is true it was moved by one of her distinguished citizens, [Mr. CLAY,] but it is equally so that it was carried by the almost united vote of the North against the almost united vote of the South, and was thus imposed on the latter by superior numbers in opposition to her strenuous efforts. The South has never given her sanction to it, or assented to the power it asserted. She was voted down, and has simply acquiesced in an arrangement which she has not had the power to reverse, and which she could not attempt to do without disturbing the peace and harmony of the Union—to which she has ever been adverse. Acting on this principle, she permitted the Territory of Iowa to be formed and the State to be admitted into the Union, under the compromise, without objection; and that is now quoted by the Senator from New York to prove her surrender of the power she claims for Congress."

Although no State in the Union and no assemblies had become adverse to this, yet it appears that it was taken for granted that it was unwelcome to the South, and therefore it was repudiated. But in going on further, to show the extent of that gentleman's dislike to it, and an expression doubtless that influenced materially the action of the Southern Senators, he proceeds to say:

"Now, let me say, Senators, if our Union and system of Government are doomed to perish, and we to share the fate of so many great people who have gone before us, the historian, who, in some future day, may record the events tending to so calamitous a result, will devote his first chapter to the ordinance of 1787, as lauded as it is and its authors have been, as the first in that series which led to it. His next chapter will be devoted to the Missouri compromise, and the next to the present agitation. Whether there will be another beyond, I know not. It will depend on what we may do."

Here was a formal repudiation of the Missouri compromise line, upon the principle of which Texas had been brought into the Union, and by which one third of her territorial limits had been cut off to free soil. As Texas did come into the Union upon that line, I felt warranted and instructed by the Texan people to vote for the Missouri compromise when a bill for a territorial government came up, and I did it.

In aiding the production of this compromise, or in its effectuation, I found it necessary, in justification of myself, and in the urgency I felt for its success, to make some remarks. I will read some extracts from the debate which took place. In a speech upon Mr. Clay's resolutions, and when it was pretty well ascertained they would not pass, on the 8th of February, 1850, I made the following remarks:

"But I call upon the friends of the Union from every quarter, to come forward like men, and to sacrifice their differences upon the common altar of their country's good, and to form a bulwark around the Constitution that cannot be shaken. It will require many efforts, sir, and they must expect to meet with prejudices growing up around them that will assail them from every quarter. They must stand firm to the Union, regardless of all personal consequences. Time alone can recompense them for their sacrifice and their labors; for devotion to country can never be forgotten, when it is offered freely, and without expectation of reward. The incense of self-sacrifice, when thus offered on the altar of their country, will be acceptable to the people. I have no doubt that this question might be easily adjusted, if gentlemen would encourage such disposition and feeling as doubtless actuate a large portion, if not all, of this body, if they would come up to the work. I have no doubt six Senators here could be designated, without reference to party, (you may, if you please, disregard the section of country from which they come,) who would act as a Committee of Conference, and sit down together as wayfarers men, and produce satisfactory reconciliation, thereby diffusing universal peace, and calming the agitated waves that are lashing at the base of our Capitol, and speak comfort and solace to millions of freemen.

"Do not the American people love this Union? Are they not devoted to it? Is not every reminiscence of the past associated with its glories, and are they not calculated to inspire prayers for its prosperity and perpetuity? If this were not the case, you might think lightly of our noble Confederacy; but so it is—it stands connected with every fibre of the national heart, and is interwoven with every glorious recollection of the past, which affection or reverence can inspire in the minds of the American people. It is not, Mr. President, that twenty-three millions of souls are involved in the perpetuity of this Union; it is not that every consideration of happiness connected with country attaches to it; but it is because it is the great moral, social, and political lever, that has moved, is moving, and will continue to move the world. Look abroad at foreign nations, and behold the influence of our example upon them—not ours, for I feel a sense of humiliation when I contrast the efforts of any man now living with the illustrious achievements of the departed sages and heroes who performed this mighty work."

These were the remarks which I made in that speech. In the progress of it, the honorable Senator from Mississippi, supposing that I alluded to the convention which had assembled in Mississippi, interposed and said:

"Mr. FOOTE. Does my friend from Texas wish to be understood as undertaking to decry or censure the State of Mississippi for having originated this convention?"

The reply was:

"Mr. HOUSTON. The last thing in the world."

I again proceeded with my remarks, when the honorable Senator from Mississippi interposed:

"Mr. FOOTE. I hope my friend will pardon me for asking of him an additional explanation. I trust he did not intend to insinuate as a matter of opinion, still less to make the statement as a matter of fact, derived from any authority, that the sovereign State of Mississippi, in the incipient movement towards the Nashville Convention, for which she is responsible, was instigated by South Carolina, or her statesmen; or that she acted otherwise than upon her own unbiased judgment without instigation from any quarter. I know that what he has said will be understood as intimating, at least, that this conventional movement of ours was stimulated by South Carolina, and was the result of concert between certain South Carolina politicians and certain politicians in Mississippi, with a view of having that movement originate in the State of Mississippi instead of South Carolina, in order to avoid any odium that might thereby arise. I am sure he did not intend to be so understood, and yet he will be if he does not correct his remarks."

My reply was:

"Mr. HOUSTON. I can assure the honorable Senator that this is a very delicate and complicated question. But I believe that if South Carolina never had existed, and if it had not been for her disposition, and the movement which began there, Mississippi would never have thought of it."

Again the gentleman said:

"Mr. FOOTE. If the honorable Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will remark, that upon the point on which he has been so well answered by my colleague, I have nothing to say. But in addition I wish to say that if the honorable Senator from Texas supposes that there is a single man of intelligence and character in the State of Mississippi who recognizes any human being as his leader, his political leader, or as his master, by whom and to whom he is to be held responsible, he has grossly misjudged the people. I had hoped that the demeanor of those who represent Mississippi here and elsewhere, would have afforded satisfactory evidence to that Senator and to all men, that, highly as we reverence character, high intellect, purity of heart, and spotlessness of reputation, there is no man who represents the State of Mississippi in the Halls of Congress at the present time, who recognizes any human being in the world as his leader or controller, or as entitled to have any undue influence over his mind or conduct—at any rate I speak for myself—and I hope the Senator will understand me when I say, I recognize no leader on the face of the globe."

Mr. FOOTE. I must explain my connection with a matter which is more or less connected with myself, and which, if unexplained, may subject me to misapprehension. It will be seen that, in a speech which I made here a few days ago, I did state what I now know to be true, that Mr. Calhoun, during his life, with the purest intentions, with no disposition to lead or control our State, had a pretty extensive correspondence with persons there. This is a fact which I did not know at the time I delivered the speech which has been read by the honorable Senator. The truth is, that I never heard, until recently, of the letter which I read the other day of Mr. Calhoun to a fellow-citizen of mine, Mr. Tarpley. I was surprised when I found that such a letter had been written. In the course of last year—and I say it without intending to cast any imputation anywhere—I ascertained by various evidences, that several gentlemen in my own State had been corresponded with by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, now no more, on this subject. The letters that I have seen, according generally with this one, satisfied my mind that the modus operandi of the Convention was more or less marked out by his great intellect.

At the time I made the remarks which have been read, I did not believe that any human being in the world had received a letter from Mr. Calhoun on the subject, except one which I myself received, and which has been published long since. I must say that a gentleman, a friend of mine, in the State of Mississippi, well known to my colleague, who was a partner of mine in the practice of the law, and for many years an intimate friend, (but from whom I am now very painfully separated by existing questions,) wrote me a letter early in the summer before last, desiring me to correspond with various distinguished Southern statesmen, including Mr. Calhoun, for the purpose of ascertaining what their opinions were as to the action which was to be considered in the State of Mississippi in the event of a Convention being called. I was then in the State of Virginia, in my native county, and I undertook to hold a correspondence with various persons on this subject. If there was any intrusion on this delicate matter on the part of anybody, I was the intruder. I wrote to the late Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN;] I wrote to the Senator from Virginia, [MR. HUNTER,] who wrote me a very patriotic and interesting letter, which never has been published, but which, if published, would evince the correctness of the opinion which I have always entertained of him—which would prove that he is a sound statesman, and an upright patriot. Neither of their letters indicated disunion, or intimated the necessity of a change in the Constitution, or certainly I would not have been the medium through which their communications were introduced to the people in my own State. When this matter came up to-day, the Senator from Texas pursued a line of remark at which I was somewhat galled, I confess, as one of the Senators from Mississippi. I refer to his insinuation that that State was controlled by certain persons in South Carolina. I did not know then that letters had been addressed to any member of the Convention, except to Judge Sharkey. So far as I knew, no other members of the Convention received any communication from him. I believe that another letter addressed to me by Mr. Calhoun was pretty freely circulated—I was so informed, at least. I make this statement to throw some light on my course in regard to this matter. I still say that the State of Mississippi was not dictated to—was not led or controlled, and that no attempt was made to lead or control it, so far as I know. Yet, through me a correspondence took place, which, no doubt, resulted in the adoption of a certain course of proceeding by that State, as I now believe. I am much indebted to the gentleman for allowing me this opportunity to explain.

MR. HOUSTON. I wish to put myself right in relation to the views I then entertained upon the subject. Certainly I did not know officially or reputedly that any interference had taken place in reference to this matter, but I believed, from the indications which afterwards surrounded me, that something of the kind must have been done. And when I alluded to it, it was without information further than that which results from analogy to other things. I find that the honorable Senator from Mississippi, the other day, declared as follows:

"I have heretofore mentioned in this body, that it was through me, in the first instance, that Mr. Calhoun succeeded in instigating the incipient movements in Mississippi, which led to the calling of the Nashville Convention. I repeat that statement now, and insist that my fellow-citizens of Mississippi, who had been thus induced to assume the responsibility of calling the general convention into being, had a right to expect the earliest information to be given to them of any contemplated departure from the original plan of operation."

This merely corroborated what I then stated. It establishes it beyond all controversy. It will be remembered that in 1847 I was denounced for voting for the Missouri compromise line. In October, 1849, the Mississippi Convention occurred, and the Nashville Convention grew out of it. At the adjourned meeting of the Nashville Convention the ultimatum laid down by that body was that very identical line which had been repudiated by the whole South. That line they made the ultimatum for all difficulties then existing. Their motto was "Thirty-six thirty or fight." I had been denounced for supporting and voting for that line, and the whole South had repudiated it. In 1850, the Nashville Convention laid it down as the only ground of compromise that could be acceded to by the South. I only wish to show the consistency with which I adhered to it until it was repudiated. Even afterwards, when the compromise was brought up, I introduced a resolution for the purpose of asserting the claim of the South to extending the line of 36° 30' to the Pacific. That is what I wish to do. Certain gentlemen did not seem to consider me so ultra when I voted for the Missouri compromise in favor of the South, as when I voted for it when it favored the North. I voted for it upon principle. But after I did vote for it it was repudiated by the South and thus rendered void.

I well remember another thing in which I differed from the honorable Senator from Mississippi. However much I may defer to his intelligence, wisdom, statesmanship, and patriotism, yet I have been unfortunate in dissenting from various schemes of his. I was directly opposed to the Southern Address. I did not sign that Address. My colleague [MR. RUSK] did not sign it. I believe we were the only Southern Senators who did not sign that Address. I believed that that Address was fraught with mischief; and when I saw the consequent action that grew out of it—when I saw the Mississippi Convention and the Nashville Convention—I became more satisfied with my own course in not signing it. I did not denounce those gentlemen who did sign it; but I wish to show that I have been consistent throughout in reference to the compromise and to the rights of the South. I have been unwilling to sacrifice those rights. My associations and all my interests are in the South. If I do not own millions of broad acres, all that I do own is in the South; yet I am not going to insist upon requisitions that I do not deem right; nor am I going to follow fantasies for legislative direction by which the country cannot be benefited. I am sent here to act in a legislative capacity for my State in matters of detail, and for the Union on general subjects. I have one director in that: it is the Constitution. Wherever that directs me there will I go.

MR. PRESIDENT, I delivered my speech on the subject of the compromise on the 8th of February, 1850; and the resolution of compromise was introduced on the 14th of February following—six days afterwards, so that I have not been wholly disconnected from that matter. I put it to the candor of any gentleman, whether I have not been as zealous and as forward in the support of that measure as any other member of this body. I occupied no equivocal position in relation to it, or the results growing out of it. I wish to add no additional plank to that platform. The honorable gentleman may deem it necessary to do so. If he presents himself as the organ of the party to which I belong, and wishes to ingraft this condition upon the platform, I, as a member of the Democratic party—unimportant as I may be—most solemnly, in the face of the Senate, this assemblage, and the world, protest against any test that has not its origin in the action of the Democratic National Convention, called for political purposes. I never will record my vote on the Journals of this Senate for a resolution that is not connected with legislation, and is purely political in its character. I will not blacken the white paper of the Senate with it. If I distrusted the intelligence of the American people; if I distrusted their patriotism, I might set myself up as a dictator of opinions, and instruct them in what they ought to do. But I have no pretensions to the character of a leader. I am willing to follow; and I have got the broad road before me. I have got the platform on which we have stood, and on which we have acted. I did not expect an entire concordance of opinions, or of platforms; but such as have formerly reconciled those opinions. Heretofore gentlemen in favor of internal improvements and gentlemen opposed to them have stood upon the same platform. Tariff and anti-tariff gentlemen have stood upon the same platform: they have supported the great creed of Democracy; and if you begin to enlarge that platform we shall have more trouble hereafter in reconciling other jarring interests. It will create additional trouble to the party. I believed that the discord which had existed throughout the country on various subjects, and particularly the conflict between the North and South, was fast dying away and would soon be forgotten, until some new subject would furnish excitement to the American people, and divert their minds from this subject, which had so long agitated them. I thought they had determined to be reconciled.

What was done has had the acquiescence of both political parties. It has been unfortunately so mixed up as to have had a wet blanket thrown over it; and really at this time I had hoped that agitation was about to subside, and that the old parties would fall into their ranks and march on quietly to the attainment of the objects they thought most eligible or judicious. And I never shall sanction any measure which is calculated only to distract the party to which I belong. I will do everything I can, fairly and justly, conformably to the Constitution, to pour oil on the troubled waters and to quiet them; but I will not introduce a fire-brand. I will not attempt to distract the party by anything extraneous to the principles which have bound them together. I never will, as long as I live, seek to become the dictator of a party, as to what they ought to do. If I have any measure relating to the interests of the party to introduce, I will submit it to its members; and if they think it ought not to be introduced, I will be prepared to hear their reasons; and if a majority shall overrule my own opinions, I will, upon conviction, surrender my impressions to their decision. I have never attached sufficient importance to myself to believe that I have a right to control the party, or to believe that my dictation should be their law, or my opinions their guide.

If I could be induced for one moment to believe that the Democratic party could derive any benefit from the adoption of this resolution, without prejudice to the general weal of the country, I might not oppose it. But now I can see no propriety or utility in it, and therefore I shall oppose it.

Is it intended to give effect to the compromise? Will those measures derive any additional force from the passage of this resolution? Will they be more binding? I think not. Is it customary to reenact laws of Congress, or to indorse them by resolution while they remain upon the statute-book? Will not the adoption of this resolution in effect declare that we have not full confidence in existing laws passed by a former Congress? If this resolution is necessary at this time, will not a similar resolution be necessary at each succeeding Congress, upon the compromise and every other important measure that may be passed? And will not such a course have a tendency to produce unpleasant scenes in the halls of legislation, impair public confidence in our proceedings, and keep incessant agitation in the community? If a minority are willing to acquiesce in a measure, and the country is tending to repose after the settlement of controverted questions, so far as they can be settled by the action of Congress, does it become a magnanimous majority to open afresh the sorest points of severe conflicts that have been allayed, and which the minority do not propose to disturb? And especially, sir, is it magnanimous in the majority to open these questions again, when the very object of their adoption was to allay agitation? I voted for them, each and all, as peace measures. As such they have been received by the country, and millions have rejoiced that these unhappy controversies had been adjusted. Since these peace measures were adopted, an entire session of Congress has passed, and now at the commencement of a new session of a new Congress, a resolution is offered which again opens, and has opened, the aggravating agitation. It is an AGITATING RESOLUTION upon a series of PEACE MEASURES, and measures, too, acquiesced in by nearly the whole country. Where, sir, is the practicability of this resolution? Its friends have not shown it, and cannot. Its evil influences are already apparent as defeating the very object of the compromise measures; and as a fast friend of the adjustment, I cannot consistently vote for it. Why not, sir, introduce a resolution here declaring that the independent treasury bill shall be a final adjustment of the questions that arose during its progress through the two Houses of Congress? Some of our political friends at first opposed that measure, but have since acquiesced in it. If the position of the Senator from Mississippi be correct, we must get up a resolution to "commit" Senators upon that measure at the present time. Why is it not done? Simply because such a course would be weakness, and worse—it would be ridiculous; but no more ridiculous than the resolution now before us. I cannot, Mr. President, trifle with laws in this way. It is not compatible with the dignity of this honorable body, or consistent with the well-established principles of legislation in this country. Sir, I again say there is no practicability in this resolution. It may be adapted to a peculiar platform in Mississippi; but it is not a suitable platform for the Democratic party of this whole country.

I do not expect to occupy any of the time of the Senate by adverting to matters in connection with myself. But at the conclusion of the last session of Congress, I was attacked by a then member of the Senate from South Carolina, in a manner of which I cannot refrain from speaking. A publication had appeared over my name in a letter addressed to a gentleman, and in which some error had accidentally occurred in transcribing. I was attacked as having charged upon South Carolina certain principles which were not contained in her constitution. It was said that what was in her constitution was in the constitution of every other State, and therefore I must have been either very ignorant of the laws of South Carolina and the other States, or it was a very useless charge. It has been my misfortune to be charged with having assailed the State of South Carolina. Now once for all, as I have no great inclination to be speaking in the Senate or elsewhere, I will place myself right in relation to South Carolina. Whenever I have spoken of that State, I did not allude to the people, but to her rulers. I did not call in question their patriotism, but their policy. I had repeatedly been attacked by citizens of that State; I had been denounced by the illustrious man, upon whose memory I would not cast a slur. He is gone, and with him are buried all the resentments I might ever have felt; but my feelings towards him were only those which resulted from wrongs, real or imaginary, which I had suffered. I have no enmity with him, so that I can have no feelings of enmity to gratify when I allude to South Carolina, or to her most distinguished citizen. When I speak of her, I do it with all deference to her honored Senator, [Mr. BUTLER,] who sits before me. I do not agree with all her institutions; and though she is very tenacious in relation to State rights, of which I am a sincere lover—for I would die before I would see any of the rights which belong to the States wrested from them—yet it seems to me that if South Carolina was as sensitive with regard to her municipal institutions as she is with regard to her relations with the Federal Government, she would perhaps find that she had a great deal to do. In looking over the constitutions of the various States of the Union, and comparing them with the Federal Constitution, I have come to the conclusion that South Carolina is not more liberal in her institutions to her own citizens than are most of the other States. If the Federal Government were to enact a law by Congress, approved by the President, dictating to any State or States that they should not exercise the fullest latitude of suffrage or franchise, it would be deemed a flagrant usurpation, and no State would submit to it. Suppose Congress, if it had the power, were to pass a law saying to Virginia or New York, or any other State, You shall not permit your citizens to vote for the electors of President or Vice President; you shall not permit them to vote for the Governor of your State; what would be said in reply to this? Why it would be one of the most flagrant outrages by Federal authority that ever was committed upon the rights of the States. It would be a usurpation of a most atrocious character. Yet South Carolina has never permitted one of her private citizens to vote for the electors for President or Vice President, or to vote for the Governor of the State. They know no more who is to be voted for as the Governor, or who is to be voted for as the Chief Magistrate of the Union, than they know of the interior of Africa.

I used the term oligarchy towards the legislative body of South Carolina, because the constitution of that State is in their power. Such is the rotten-borough system of South Carolina that forty persons in the lowlands wield as much political influence as thousands in the uplands. These were the objections which I made to the institutions of the State. I made no objection to the people of the State. I made it to those whom I believed to be oppressors and usurpers. The people of South Carolina are a gallant and daring people. They are as generous, noble, and warm-hearted as the sun under which they live. I commend them. But let us recollect that had the gallant Palmetto regiment returned from Chapultepec, where it was commanded by the gallant and generous Butler, who, not satisfied with the infliction of severe wounds, rushed on bravely, leading his men on to victory, till he fell, he would not have had the privilege of voting for the Chief Magistrate of his State, or for electors for the President and Vice President of the Union. Nor, sir, would any one of his gallant followers. I say it is wrong thus to deprive the people of South Carolina of their privileges; and if disunion were to begin there, no one could blame the highlanders of South Carolina for drawing a line of demarcation between oppressors and the oppressed. But I would be sorry to see discord of that kind arise. And there may be policy in keeping up agitation against the Federal Government, for some men would rather be chief in a village than second in Rome; and it might do very well to create a diversion by loud complaints against the Federal authorities, to prevent the people from looking into their domestic affairs.

I have on some occasions not had the good fortune to act in accordance with the wishes of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] I never have believed, nor will I ever believe, that one, associated as he is with such patriotic recollections from the commencement of the Revolution down to the present day—that he, in whose veins flows the blood of all the Butlers, would be wanting in patriotism. I respect his love of country, though I dissent from him in some of his opinions.

Mr. President, twenty-seven years ago I had the honor to occupy a seat in the House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee. I recollect that in the discussion of the tariff act of 1824, for the first time in my life I heard the idea suggested that there might be secession, disunion, or resistance to the constitutional action of the Federal Government. When I heard it, I was amazed. I could hardly think it possible that a representative of any portion of the American people would have the fierce temerity to suggest disunion or resistance to the constitutional authorities of the land. It produced deep and intense meditation on my part. I did believe then that an example ought to be made of it, but there was no way to touch it. It wanted some technicalities to make it treason. I have heard principles of disunion boldly avowed in this Hall, and have heard Senators avow what was treason, not technically, but which was not stripped of one particle of the moral turpitude of treason. Disunion has been proclaimed in this Hall. What a delightful commentary upon the freedom of our institutions, and the forbearance of the public mind, when a man is permitted to go unscathed and unscourged, who, in a deliberative body like this, has made such a declaration! Sir, no higher assurance can be given of the freedom of our institutions and the forbearance of the American people, and their reliance upon the reason and the intelligence of the community. The intelligent mind is left free to combat error. Such sentiments, with their authors, will descend to obscurity and the tomb of oblivion. I have only to say in conclusion, that those who proclaim disunion, no matter of what name politically—that those who, for the sake of disunion, conspire against the Union and the Constitution, are very beautifully described in Holy Writ. They are "raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever!"

Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi. Mr. President, I regret very much to be compelled to trespass upon the attention of the Senate, but all must perceive that it will be impossible for me, without relinquishing all sentiments of self-respect, to permit what has fallen from the honorable Senator from Texas to go unreplicated. Whether the Senator prepared his speech, expecting I should be absent, and made the first regular assault on me which he has ever undertaken in this body, under the hope that it would not be responded to, remains to be decided by others. I happened to be here, and I intend, so far as I can, to give him a Roland for an Oliver.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I would say that I notified him on Saturday, that I should oppose this resolution.

Mr. FOOTE. The gentleman did; but he gave no notification that he would make such an attack as he has made. I had heard a rumor through town, that I was to receive a drubbing here this morning, during my absence, and I remained on that account. I have heard the gentleman at length, and have listened to him with forbearance, without any undue resentment; and I am very happy that he has given me a legitimate and proper occasion for commenting, with suitable feeling, not much at length, and with no malignity, upon his course in connection with the pending question.

The gentleman undertakes to intimate, in the very face of my solemn declaration to the contrary, (a declaration which I formally put in writing and read to the Senate,) by multiplied innuendoes, that I had introduced this resolution for some illicit party purpose; and he has given the Senate, on this occasion, the benefit of a regular party harangue. I deny the imputation made by him.

Mr. HOUSTON. I especially exempted the Senator from it.

Mr. FOOTE. The Senator did exempt me from it, but still entangled me in it, by insinuation. He knows how to manage these things very well. The impression which will go out from the Senator's speech is, that I introduced this resolution for the purpose of destroying the harmony of the Democratic party. The gentleman talked about doctors, and about persons undertaking to enlarge the party platform. All that is perfectly understood by some of us. Is there anything in this resolution repugnant to Democracy? If so, Democracy is in itself a monstrous thing. Is there anything in these compromise measures contrary to the great principles of the Democratic creed? I deny it. As a Democrat I deny it, and assert that there is not one single important, material feature connected with this plan of settlement which is not in perfect harmony with the great fundamental principles of the Democratic faith. The man who does not understand that, does not understand the first elementary principles of the Democratic creed. Why, the Democratic party is a Union party—a party strictly observant of the Constitution. The Baltimore platform, (I am afraid the gentleman has never read it,) embodies every principle of this plan of compromise. I took occasion to say the other day that the Democratic party fought out the contest of 1848 on the principle of non-intervention. I said elsewhere, in this city, in the hearing of the gentleman, that the great contest of 1848 was fought upon the principle of non-intervention, which is the principle embodied in this plan of settlement. That principle was not received from the Senator from Texas, but from another and a much higher source, and was adopted by the whole Democratic party of the country. Does this resolution, then, add to the Democratic platform? But for the high respect I entertain for the Senator, I should pronounce this statement a slander upon the Democratic party. When the Democratic party becomes a Free-Soil party—when the members of it are permitted to enter into secret intrigues for the purpose of securing the Free-Soil votes for the presidential and other offices, by avoiding a bold and manly assertion of the great principles which lie at the very foundation of the Democratic creed of the country, and which are essential to the prosperity and true power of this great Republic—when such schemes can succeed, then indeed will the glory of our Democratic Israel depart, and unprincipled demagogues be enthroned in high places. I understand this matter, and the country shall understand it.

The gentleman says he defers to the feelings of this body; he does not originate anything here; he looks to outward feeling. It is a curse to this country that there are so many members of Congress who are constantly looking out beyond the body to ascertain what are the indications of public feeling, not because they respect public feeling more than other men, but because they are anxious to bolster up their tottering popularity to obtain high office, by trimming their sails to any gale that happens to be blowing. The aura popularis is the breeze under the influence of which these gentlemen sail; and they are eternally looking out to ascertain whether there are any breakers ahead that may possibly shatter the frail vessel which contains their hopes of future political advancement. Therefore, they do not look into their own consciences for motives of action, and they do not consult their own understandings. They do not undertake to examine the great principles of public expediency, but they ascertain, if they can, what is popular, or what is likely to be popular, by looking out of Congress, as the gentleman says, and in that way they expect to obtain, some of them, high office. They have underrated the intelligence of the people of this country. The people have a little more understanding than some persons suppose. The trickery of demagogism has already become so familiar to the intelligent and sagacious people of this country that it is no sooner practised in their view than the performer finds himself prostrated before an indignant and outraged constituency.

Sir, I hope the day has gone by when any little tricksters, with shallow intellects, utterly deficient in all knowledge of statesmanship, with no moral quality on the face of God's earth, who would induce any man to think of them for high station, will be able by sly trickery and underhanded management, to attain high places, the incumbency of which by such persons must inevitably inflict permanent, lasting, and inextinguishable disgrace upon our free institutions. I have no respect for demagogues; I like sometimes to expose them. I am not doing it now; oh no, I would not be so discourteous and unparliamentary; but I do like sometimes to expose persons of this class. I do like sometimes, if I may use the expression, to employ the cudgel of casuistry upon such people.

The Senator from Texas talks about the Senate of the United States being converted into a political machine. What did he mean by that? Nothing in the world, of course. He talks about the resolution being a flagrant usurpation upon the people's rights. He did not mean anything disrespectful by that—oh, no. But the gentleman says that this thing commenced in the Democratic caucus, and that a similar resolution being rejected there, it was vamped up and reintroduced here for a similar purpose. The gentleman is willing, as I understand him, that the unity and concord of the Democratic party shall not be so far broken in upon as to prevent the rankest Free-Soilers from coming into our midst, and exercising efficient influence in the political contests of the day. I understand what the gentleman means. He has a very special audience. (Here the speaker pointed at Mr. RANTOL, who was sitting just behind him.) The signs of the times are very ominous. I understand them well enough. There are some men (of course not in the Senate) who are prepared to give their deliberate sanction to corrupt political bargains, by means of which mean and unprincipled men are to be elevated to high stations, through the agency of corrupt intrigue and management, of such a nature as almost to stamp permanent discredit upon the escutcheon of the Republic. Because some of us say we do not wish to associate with such people—because we say we will have no political connection with any man pledged to agitate against the fugitive slave law, who calls himself a Democrat, but who stands solemnly pledged to a fanatical constituency to come here and agitate constantly, in opposition to this law—is it to be said that we are disturbing the harmony of the Democratic party? The gentleman may if he chooses have association with such people. I do not wish to associate with them. I have said everywhere in my own State, and I say it here, that the man who is pledged in the North to agitate against the fugitive slave bill; and the man in the South, who is pledged to agitate in opposition to any part of this great plan of compromise, is, in my judgment, no patriot in the first place, and is secondly no Democrat. I do not charge the gentleman with wishing to associate with such persons. I do not say that he has corrupt intentions himself. I do not say that he wishes to use certain persons for his own particular purposes—that he is willing to discredit the Democratic party, to disgrace its ancient creed, to pull down its primeval dignity in order to have an opportunity of foisting himself, a wretched political humbug, into the highest place in this Republic. This whole imagination is nauseating—it is disgusting—it is horrifying.

The gentleman quotes Scripture, and says that he wishes to judge men by their works, not by their professions. So do I. What are the works of the honorable gentleman? I will show him up a little on that score. What are his works, I repeat? Why, he intimates that he is the author of the compromise. He says he made a speech, in which he prepared the way for the compromise; and then went off to Texas, leaving other persons to perform the labor of perfecting the scheme. I can say with perfect truth, that the gentleman did nothing to promote the passage of any of the measures of compromise, except the bill granting money to Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I voted for every measure composing the compromise.

Mr. FOOTE. I voted for every measure except the California bill and the District of Columbia bill. Why did that gentleman vote for the California bill? Was it because he was more disposed to sympathize with California than other Senators? Why did he vote for the Oregon bill in 1848, following the lead of the late illustrious Senator from Missouri? [Mr. BENTON.] Rumor says—I will not say it, for it would be unparliamentary—that the honorable gentleman was then looking out for the Free-Soil vote, and hoped to be elected by means of certain Free-Soil support to the Presidency. I know a man, sir, who thinks he has very high pretensions to presidential honors; who, to my knowledge, for the last four or five years has been constantly engaged in the most corrupt and contemptible trickery, in order to secure the highest advancement known in this country, through the wretched instrumentality of the Free-Soil vote of the North; notwithstanding he was a Southern man by birth, and professed to have feelings such as belong naturally to Southern men upon the disputed questions of the times. Such a man I pronounce to be a traitor to the South, no matter who he is—I pronounce a traitor to all honest principles, and a contemptible demagogue, wholly unworthy the respect of this body, and deserving of expulsion from it, should he ever obtain a place here. Such is my opinion, and I am responsible for its expression in every mode known to honorable men.
